S. 4048. An act granting an increase of pension to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows of such soldiers and sailors.

On motion of Mr. FULLER, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the several bills were passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DALZELL took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 15219, the Indian appropriation bill; and pending the putting of that motion I ask unanimous consent that the balance of to-day and so much of the time as this committee occupies on Monday be used wholly in general debate, and that the bill be not taken up for consideration under the five-minute rule until Tuesday; that the general debate be closed on Monday.

I have consulted with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], and I understand that this proposition is agreeable to him.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, three hours on this side will be all that we require for general debate, and as I understand we can have that this afternoon—this afternoon and Monday—and that the bill will not be taken up for consideration under the five-minute rule until Tuesday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, and, pending that, asks unanimous consent that general debate close with Monday's session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should have asked also that the time to be allotted to the majority be under the control either of the chairman of the committee or the ranking member, and that the time for the other side be under the control of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] or the ranking member of the committee on that side, should he be absent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And that the time be controlled equally by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, with Mr. PERKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15219, the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the bill as now presented is based almost entirely on the estimates by the Department for the coming year. So far as any appropriation is carried by the bill, it is based entirely either upon the estimates made by the Department or subsequent recommendations made by the Bureau or Department of the Interior.

There are one or two matters of legislation in the bill to which I will allude in a moment, which have the approval of the Department and of the Bureau. The amount appropriated for the Indian Service for the fiscal year closing July 1 coming was $10,305,000—leaving off the odd dollars. The amount estimated for the bill which is now presented was $8,219,000, and the total sum carried by the bill now is $8,215,000, or a trifle less than the amount estimated. Notwithstanding the amount estimated for was $8,219,000, subsequent recommendations from the Department added quite materially to the amount. So that the difference of $4,000 does not show the total amount that the committee saw fit to reduce the proposed appropriation from the amount originally suggested by the Department and by the Bureau.

The committee have tried, Mr. Chairman, in formulating the bill to pare off wherever the good of the service would not be detrimentally affected thereby. They have tried to formulate the bill with the idea of economy, but not that economy injurious to the service.

The general administration of the work of the Department and of the Bureau during the last year has been very satisfactory. Much has been done to extend the irrigation work which has brought into a condition of profit tens of thousands of acres of Indian land. Very many Indians, running into the thousands, have received their allotment during the year. The Congress saw fit a year ago to appropriate $25,000 to be used expressly to eliminate the sale or to prohibit and stop the sale of liquor among the Indians. That money has been expended; much more than half of it was expended during the first six months of the fiscal year, and expended to very great advantage. It is really surprising that a sum no greater than that appropriated was used to accomplish so much as has been accomplished with this money. The officers chosen by the Bureau to carry out its mandate in this regard have exercised the utmost vigilance, and some of them at least, have exhibited an exceptionally high degree of detective skill, if I may use that expression, and much has been done to stamp out this evil.

Mr. Chairman, we all know that the furnishing of liquor to the Indians is an evil. It may be true that oil and water does not mix; whisky and Indians always mix when an Indian has a chance to mix it, and it is always done to the detriment of the Indians, and usually, if there is any fair chance to accomplish that end, in the interest of disorder, bad morals, and bad government.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I supposed when the appropriation was made last year that it was for the purpose of prohibiting the sale of liquor to Indians in the Indian Territory.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, and the greater part of it was so used.

Mr. MANN. Why, then, is there occasion for an appropriation now? There is no Indian Territory. Is it not the duty of Oklahoma to enforce her laws the same as any other State enforces its laws?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that, as I view it, our moral obligations to the Indians—I am not speaking of the legal obligation—does not entirely cease because a portion of Oklahoma was formerly called Indian Territory.

Mr. MANN. Another question. Before statehood was granted, as I understand, in the Indian Territory the enforcement of this law was not confined to the Indian reservations.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no. The provision making this appropriation expressly authorized the expenditure outside of Indian reservations and, in fact, the greater portion of it, I believe, was expended outside of the reservations, and a large part of the investigation was carried on before any shipment reached the Territory.

Mr. MANN. I understand, and at that time there was no machinery or government in the Indian Territory.

Mr. SHERMAN. No machinery for State government.

Mr. MANN. There was no machinery of any sort.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, there was.

Mr. MANN. No machinery for local government in the Indian Territory.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; but there was government which the United States provided.

Mr. MANN. Nothing except machinery provided by the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. And the tribal government. The tribes all had their own governments.

Mr. MANN. So far as the United States is concerned now, it is eliminated from the local government. They have a local government of their own under the State government.

Mr. SHERMAN. They have.

Mr. MANN. Shall it be our policy to proceed to enforce the antiliquor law in the Indian Territory outside of the reservation and in various other States of the Union outside of the reservations?

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as it affects the Indian, yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What obligation still remains?

Mr. CARTER. This obligation—that under the enabling act which our constitution adopts the Federal Government still claims supervision over all Indians who have restrictions on their lands. They claim supervision over their lands, and, in so far as disposing of them or hypothecating them is concerned, the Federal Government still assumes to retain the restrictions.

Mr. MANN. Do they have the enforcement of all police regulations? Does the Federal Government undertake in the Indian Territory now to enforce the constitution and police regulations of the State of Oklahoma?

Mr. CARTER. The Federal Government has no police regulations whatever in the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. MANN. I say, do we undertake to enforce local regulations? You have prohibited the sale of liquor there.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it the duty of the Federal Government to enforce that provision of the constitution and laws of the State of Oklahoma simply because the people are Indians?

Mr. CARTER. Under a Federal statute the sale of intoxicants to Indians is prohibited.

Mr. MANN. Should we extend that proposition all over the country, and then should we say that having enforced it as to Indians we ought to enforce it as to other people who ought not to drink and who want to drink?

Mr. CARTER. I would not say that, but the Indians have a large amount of property. We are expecting, by a bill, to remove the restrictions from that property and we think that every precaution should be taken to keep whisky away from the full-blooded Indians. If the United States Government can assist in doing that, it is not only its legal but its moral duty to do so.

Mr. OLMSTED. In what way could the United States Government assist in enforcing the laws of Oklahoma?

Mr. CARTER. By enforcing the United States statute prohibiting the sale of whisky to Indians.

Mr. OLMSTED. In having the secret service men discover the offenders?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where do these Indians live?

Mr. CARTER. All over the United States, including the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is that a reservation?

Mr. CARTER. No, sir; the lands have been allotted.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are they still what you call savages, or are they civilized?

Mr. CARTER. They are civilized.

Mr. SHERMAN. Some of them are and some of them are not; is not that true?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; about 20 or 25 per cent who are not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the prohibitory law apply to the uncivilized as well as to the civilized?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not a prohibitory law. This is an appropriation authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to expend it in the suppression of the sale of liquor to Indians—not alone in the Indian Territory, but to Indians anywhere.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And punish the people who sell whisky to them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, certainly it does.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think that is the best thing in order to eliminate the evil. We have been trying to do that for years and years.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to get the gentleman's opinion how far this bill goes in the making of appropriations for secret service to enforce State police laws.

Mr. SHERMAN. We do not have to enforce police laws; we have national laws which prohibit the sale of liquor to Indians.

Mr. MANN. Not outside of reservations?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; outside of reservations.

Mr. MANN. The Federal Government has no jurisdiction to say that an Indian coming to this town, not belonging to a tribe——

Mr. SHERMAN. Not belonging to a tribe is another proposition.

Mr. MANN. Well, not belonging to a tribe under the control of the Federal Government. The Federal Government has no control over the question at all, and all you can do under this provision as to those Indians is to employ secret-service people and enforce the local regulations. So long as we made regulations, while the Indian Territory was under the control of the Federal Government, we were enforcing our laws, but those laws are no longer controlling there, except so far as we have control over the Indians. But it is not limited to them at all——

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not limited to the Indian Territory at all.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is expressly extended to the Indian Territory, but for years we have had a provision for a much less amount to be used in the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians, not only on reservations, but off reservations.

Mr. MANN. Of course I take it the gentleman's opinion is far superior to mine, but I have always understood in the House that the appropriation for this purpose was to enforce the law against the sale of liquor to Indians on the reservations, because the Government has no jurisdiction as to whether the Indian was buying liquor in this town or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Just so long as he is a tribal Indian and has not taken his allotment and become a citizen.

Mr. MANN. We have done away with the tribal Indian.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; we have not entirely.

Mr. MANN. Not entirely; but the gentleman will not say, I think, that it is intended to spend this money that is proposed to be appropriated in reference to tribal Indians at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes; I will say it is in part; not all, but in part.

Mr. MANN. The last appropriation was expended mainly for the purpose of prohibiting the sale to Indians in the Indian Territory.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Which is a perfectly proper function of the Federal Government, but it seems to me it is a question whether the State having assumed statehood should not enforce its own law where our law is superseded by the State law as to all these Indians in tribal relations or upon reservations.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact, and, of course, when we get under the five-minute rule and reach that particular item we may discuss this subject further. Notwithstanding that allotments have been made to Indians in the Indian Territory, the right to alienate is especially reserved for twenty-five years, and these hundreds of thousands of acres of land do not contribute one cent for the maintenance of the government of Oklahoma or any of its counties.

Mr. MANN. Well, who enforces the law, the Federal Government or the State government?

Mr. SHERMAN. I assume that the government of Oklahoma will, although we still have, where any tribal relation exists, our local police courts and local Indian police.

Mr. MANN. That is where the tribal relations exist already in the reservation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Nobody questions that proposition. I was only asking for information as to the other point of view, as to how far it is the duty of the Federal Government to act in these matters. It is a clear interference with States rights, although I am not so much of a States rights man as some people.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not refer the gentleman to the section at this moment, but there is a section in the Revised Statutes which makes it illegal to sell liquor to an Indian.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not find any such statute.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, I can, too; and I have over and over again, in the United States courts in the State of New York, seen prosecutions for the violation of this statute. In fact, there was a time when my friend from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER] was United States district attorney, as he will recall, that a large part of his time was occupied in prosecuting cases under the statute.

Mr. MANN. The Seneca Indians have been to a certain extent, or were then, under the control of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senecas have not been under the control of the United States Government for a good many years.

Mr. MANN. I am not positive as to names. But you have an Indian tribe up there——

Mr. SHERMAN. They are still tribal. The Government has been released from the care of the New York Indians for a quarter of a century.

Mr. MANN. The Indian who is released so that he becomes a citizen and can vote, the United States Government can not control the action of a State in reference to; and the United States Government has no authority to say that a man who has had conferred upon him the right of citizenship, whether he be of Indian blood or not, shall or shall not do a certain thing which is merely a matter of purely local police regulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. And when the Indian becomes a citizen it is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. MANN. That is what the gentleman is proposing now.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, I am not. The money has been used for Indians who were not citizens.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose one of those Indians who is not a citizen in Oklahoma commits an assault on one of the citizens of Oklahoma, is he amenable to the Federal or to the State law?

Mr. SHERMAN. He is amenable to the State law, of course.

Mr. OLMSTED. Can the gentleman state what proportion of the Indians are citizens? Is not the percentage very small?

Mr. SHERMAN. The proportion of Indians who are citizens is not small. I can not give the gentleman the exact figure, but it is large. The statute expressly provides that the moment an Indian accepts his allotment by that very act he becomes a citizen. The statute also provides that all Indians other than those who maintain the tribal relations in the Indian Territory are citizens of the United States.

I will proceed, Mr. Chairman. I started to say that I thought the administration of Indian affairs during the past year had been very satisfactory. I am glad to testify here, Mr. Chairman, that in my judgment the Government has to-day an exceptionally capable Commissioner of Indian Affairs, a man of broad culture, studious, energetic, industrious, and a man, too, who has made a special study of the Indian question for a great many years, and has his heart as well as his mind in the work; and in the execution of the law during the past year I think he has made distinct progress in his treatment of the Indians. He has bettered their general condition. More of them are laboring to-day than at any time before, and a few more are in schools than ever before. Last year the enrollment in the schools of the country was slightly below what it was the year before. This year it again reaches the high-water mark and, as I say, the administration, I think, has been most excellent and the general condition of the Indians is good. What we all desire, what we all hope for, is that ultimately the individual Indian will become a self-supporting and a law-abiding citizen, and, of course, allotment is one of the necessary prerequisites for that end. Tribal relations are being broken up as rapidly as possible and allotments are being made. We provide in this bill for a sum greater than we have appropriated for the last two or three years to be used for that purpose—for allotting to Indians, not only on reservations, but to Indians who have never received their allotments, and who under the terms of existing law can be allotted land from the public domain, and from that domain we are allotting as rapidly as we can.

The Commissioner, in his annual report, takes advanced and very positive ground on the subject of nonreservation schools. We have twenty-eight nonreservation schools in the country, in which we have enrolled about 3,700 pupils, as I recollect it. These schools are located all the way from 50 miles from a reservation to hundreds and hundreds of miles from a reservation. The Commissioner discusses at length in his annual report the advisability of doing away with these schools. The committee, I believe, are impressed with the belief that the Commissioner, in the main, was right in the position he took—that it is better for the Indians that they be educated as near their reservations as possible, and that the day-school education as a rule is better than nonreservation or boarding schools, where the Indians are educated away from home, where after attending school for six months or six years, they are sent back to the reservation and tepee, and then drop, I regret to say, to conditions that were no better than before they left; and, of course, in the general evening-up process, as a rule they drop back. Instead of elevating to any great extent those with whom they are thrown in contact, they are brought back and are brought down to their level. The Commissioner's idea is that the school in his reservation is the one that will eventually work out the best interests of the greatest number of Indians.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is it not especially true of the girls, rather than of the young men, that they drop back?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not. I do not think it applies more to the girls than to the young men.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I thought there were so many more of them that dropped back.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, some of them do, certainly; but the percentage of the girls that drop back, I believe, is no greater than that of the boys. I think, perhaps, there is a popular idea of degradation and lowness very apt to follow in the track of the girl on the reservation and nonreservation school; but I think the facts hardly warrant such a conclusion.

Mr. OLMSTED. Is there any evidence that the pupils on the nonreservation schools drop back any more quickly or lower than the pupils on the reservation schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; but there is this idea, that the pupils in the reservation schools and in the day schools are gone during the day, but are back at home during the night; they are in contact daily with their parents, and by that contact it is believed that perhaps they elevate them a little more than by going away and being gone a year and coming back for a month or two.

Mr. OLMSTED. On the other hand, the contact of the Indians every night and part of the day would keep their children from being elevated as much as if they were in contact with white and other citizens of elevated character.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may be possible; but the Commissioner, who has seen the Indians in their homes on the reservations, and gentlemen like the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], who live nearest to these Indians and have seen most of them, are of the opinion that in the end it is for the betterment of the Indians that they be educated as near as possible to their homes.

The Commissioner, of course, recognizes the fact that a change so great as this can not be accomplished in a moment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has not the Bureau also been impressed with the fact that those Indians who have been assigned to these nonreservation schools when they have gone home on a vacation are hard to get back to school again? I found in a recent visit to a reservation this summer that it was hard to get them back to school again and that thereby their school period was broken into.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a fact. It is a fact that the parental love of the Indian is very strong. Every Indian parent is fond of his child, and he wants that child as near to him as possible, and that affection is reciprocal.

It often happens that when the Indian comes home for a vacation he dislikes to return to his school, and of course it is a fact—one of the unsatisfactory conditions in connection with the Indian Service—that at times there is an unseemly squabble to get students for some of these nonreservation schools. As to others, there is nothing of the kind, and the students are very glad to attend those schools—for instance, the school in the district of my friend from Pennsylvania, the Carlisle School. The Indians as a rule are glad to go to that school. It does not require the same amount of effort and argument to induce them to go to that school that it does to some of the others. There are some schools to which the children are glad to go, and there are others that it is very difficult to persuade them to attend.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not exceedingly difficult to get them to go to any school, many of them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, many of them it certainly is.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. And does not the Commissioner in his report say that they have often to resort to arms, to physical force, to get them to go?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the gentleman misunderstood the report. No physical force is ever used to take an Indian to any school other than a day school right at his door. No physical force is used to take an Indian to a nonreservation school.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I understood the Commissioner's statement to be that they have gone so far as to use arms in order to get them to attend day school.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, day school; and that is under our general right to do that which is for the best interests of the Indian. There is no United States statute authorizing us to compel attendance of Indians at school.

The committee have authorized the insertion in the bill of a legislative item providing that the Commissioner shall negotiate with the various State governments where the schools are located which in his judgment can best be dispensed with or disposed of, for the disposal of these schools to the State, upon whatever reasonable and fair terms can be agreed upon. That authority, however, is simply to negotiate and report to the next session of Congress. It is not authority to dispose of the school. The Commissioner stated in his hearing before the committee that in some States he had been told by officials in high standing that the State government would be glad to take over the property of one or more schools located within its limits and make provision for the care of a certain number of Indian pupils for a specified length of time therein in return for the grant of the school plant to the State.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to ask the gentleman what is his judgment on this proposition: Whether it is better to educate the Indians in first-class schools near the reservation, or, in other words, out in the West, or to bring them to Pennsylvania, or to Tennessee, or to any other State far removed from any of their parents and far removed from the reservation?

Mr. SHERMAN. My theory is that our obligation to the Indians is met when we furnish an ordinary, reasonably decent education for the pupil, an education which comes somewhere near meeting his station in life. There is no doubt in my mind but that it would be well to maintain some of the nonreservation schools, so that we may educate there some of those who give evidence of being more apt and some of those who are specially desirous of being instructed in mechanical arts of one kind or another.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have we any such schools near the reservation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes; indeed. There is an industrial department at Carlisle——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Carlisle is in Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHERMAN. Carlisle is in Pennsylvania, but there is another industrial department in Haskell, which is in Kansas, and at Chilocco, which is in Oklahoma. We provide for the education of 100 Indian pupils down here at Hampton, in Virginia, which is really a colored school, but where there is a most excellent industrial department; and in my judgment no better results are obtained anywhere for the Indians a little further advanced than are obtained at Hampton.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How does the school work out in Oklahoma and in Kansas—out in the western territory, near the Indian's home?

Mr. SHERMAN. How does it work?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, indeed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Comparing the results of those schools with the school at Carlisle, which is the better?

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I do not know as I could say. There are certain features of the Carlisle school that personally I like. For instance, there is a system called "the outing system," under which certain pupils are farmed out, as you may say, during the vacation period, to families. Great care is taken to see that the pupils are placed only in respectable families, largely in Quaker families, and as is well known they are renowned not only for respectability, but for a great deal more than that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They have a fine baseball team there.

Mr. SHERMAN. They have a fine baseball team and a corking good football team.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the Nashville boys licked the football team a year ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I do not know how the gentleman could speak in higher praise of the Nashville boys than to say that they defeated the Carlisle boys at football. If the gentleman from Tennessee is correct in his statement, I hope that next year the Nashville College will get a game with Yale or Harvard, because Carlisle made it quite interesting for them last summer.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York will remember that back in 1815, at New Orleans, we whipped the soldiers that subsequently whipped Napoleon. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, the gentleman's influence cast its shadow before. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that if he will bring his football team to Carlisle they will learn more in fifteen minutes than they ever knew before.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, we have whipped them once. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was leading up to ask this important question: The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] stated a moment ago that it was hard to get some of these pupils to leave home, and sometimes you had to force them. Would it not be better to encourage the western schools nearer the western reservation than to encourage those farther removed?

Mr. SHERMAN. It certainly is, and the Commissioner's idea is that the schools last disposed of should be those schools.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Proceed with the idea that we take those schools where the Indian and the father and mother can go to the reservation and leave the child instead of coming to Pennsylvania or to some far-away place.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Commissioner's idea is to dispose of those schools last. Now, Mr. Chairman, another proposed legislative provision of the bill extends to the Indian Territory limiting the right of alienation. Congress some years ago provided that the individual Indian who had received his allotment might alienate that allotment upon furnishing proof to the Secretary of the Interior which satisfied him that the Indian was capable of taking care of himself. That statute excepted the Indian Territory. The committee now by their proposed amendment extends that right of alienation, subject to the supervision of the Secretary in the individual case, to the Indians in that part of Oklahoma that was formerly the Indian Territory.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to advert to the topic under consideration a few moments ago, and ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman stated that in Carlisle and a number of other schools—and the Commissioner makes the same statement—that very excellent work is done, that Indian men and Indian girls are fitted for remunerative avocations and become valuable citizens. Now, if this work can be done successfully in some schools, why not in all? Is it not largely the fault of the administration, rather than the fault of the system?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it is the fault of the system. I am glad to find something that is not the fault of the system—using the word in a broader sense than the gentleman from Michigan would. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The gentleman concedes that the schools at Carlisle have done excellent work—and the school at Hampton and certain other schools. Now, the same thing can be said of the white and colored schools; it is not the fault of the school so much as the management.

Mr. SHERMAN. It may be the fault of the management and it may be owing to location. It may be the peculiar circumstances that the Indians at a particular center are from one or two tribes which have not for generations had the advantage of being in close contact with the whites and have not attained the same degree of advancement that the Indians in other tribes have. Many considerations may come in.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the two legislative provisions I have spoken of are all that it is proposed to incorporate in the bill, and I think I have touched, although briefly, upon the many provisions of the bill in the main and upon everything old and new in it. As we are reading the bill by sections, which we will not commence doing until Tuesday, I shall be glad to give any information which any member of the committee may desire upon any particular point.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to tell us offhand in reference to the irrigation work?

Mr. SHERMAN. In what respect?

Mr. MANN. How much money has been expended for that purpose, how much land has been irrigated, and what of it has been sold? The gentleman knows it is a very interesting subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a very interesting subject, but I can not give the exact details. In the Commissioner's annual report, beginning on page 55, is a statement of the work during the last fiscal year, showing that there was expended in New Mexico $88,000, in California $12,000, Montana $10,000, Arizona and New Mexico $7,000, Nevada $7,000, another project in Nevada $3,000, and this report in subsequent pages gives the details of the expenditures during the last year. Now, it would be purely a guess as to how much had been expended, all told, for irrigation for the benefit of the Indians, but it must be upward of $1,000,000. It is a very considerable sum.

Mr. MANN. Of course these items of expense last year must all have been small projects. What is the amount carried in the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. One hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars, I think it is.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I thought it was a much larger sum. Can the gentleman tell us something also about the matter of appointments? Under the present Indian appropriation act and under this bill there are so many of these appointments that are to be made by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. We all know that the present Administration is very strongly in favor of what is called the "merit system," or appointment after what is called a "competitive examination." What is the reason for waiving these two requirements of law as to so much Indian Service?

Mr. SHERMAN. The greater part of the Indian Service—I will not say the greater part, but all of the Indian Service in Washington, the Bureau and the Department, is under the legislative bill and is not in this bill at all. All we appropriate for here is the work of what is called "the field" Indian inspectors, etc.

Mr. MANN. But here, for instance, we are told now, and very properly, that in taking the next census everything should be appointed into the classified service after a competitive examination.

Mr. SHERMAN. Some people will tell you that, but I know one who will tell you differently. I don't think they ought to be.

Mr. MANN. That is all very well. But here is the situation, an actual condition of affairs. Why, if Congress should provide in the future that certain appointments should be made on competitive examinations, should not the administration or whoever it is enforce the law and have the present men appointed in the same way in the present Department of the Government?

Mr. SHERMAN. For instance, we appropriate by this bill $200,000 for Indian police on the various reservations. They receive compensation at $25 a month for captains, and $20 a month for ordinary officers—"patrolmen," I suppose, they may be called. The gentleman, of course, would not consider that a civil-service examination ought to be required for such appointees as that.

Mr. MANN. I do not believe in political appointments——

Mr. SHERMAN. These are not political appointments. These are appointments of Indians.

Mr. MANN. On the contrary, if it should be the policy of the Administration to require that charwomen should be appointed through the Civil Service Commission, I see no reason to make an exception of these policemen at $20 a month.

Mr. SHERMAN. These policemen are all Indians.

Mr. MANN. That is all very true, but I imagine there will be no competition from white men for those jobs.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman thinks that such an appointee should be under a classified service, we differ, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will pardon me. I was not attempting to put into his speech my opinion on the subject at all. I wanted to get what the reason was from the point of view of the administration. I do not mean the President, but I mean the administration of Indian affairs—their point of view as to why so many of these places should be filled not by the system so constantly commended by the President, but by one of his appointees, regardless of the ordinary method. There must be some reason for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. For instance, we appropriate here $75,000 for practical farmers to go about from allottee to allottee and from reservation to reservation and teach the Indians in the arts of farming. Now, it seems to me perfectly apparent to any reasonable man that we ought not to have a civil-service examination for such employment as that. We formerly had a provision that these farmers must be appointed from a State or from the adjoining State, so that a farmer could not be sent from Georgia who had been in the habit of spending most of his time in raising cotton, for instance, up into Minnesota to teach Indians how to raise wheat.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that would be the method employed if the Civil Service Commission had charge of the matter?

Mr. SHERMAN. Why, certainly. The man who is employed from Florida, who spent all of his time in raising oranges, or whether he was from Wisconsin and spent all of his time in dropping trees, if he stood amongst the first three on the list would be sent out into the barren fields of Montana, where there is probably not a tree within a hundred miles, to teach the Indian farmer how to plant corn and raise wheat.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And how to irrigate.

Mr. SHERMAN. And how to irrigate.

Mr. MANN. If that is the gentleman's conception I do not wonder at this proposition, but I will not agree with the gentleman in his conception of the work being done by the Civil Service Commission. I do not believe the Administration would permit the Civil Service Commission to examine a man in such a way if he planted wheat he would know nothing about wheat planting, but, on the contrary, would be acquainted with orange-tree planting.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask a civil-service question of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. Why the gentleman is at liberty to ask any question he pleases on civil-service reform, because I am committed to the project years ago.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman permit me to ask one civil-service question of the gentleman from Illinois? I simply want to inquire whether they "plant" wheat in Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Certainly we plant wheat in Illinois; and the gentleman may endeavor to use the old distinction between planting and sowing, but that distinction has long ago disappeared among farmers.

Mr. OLMSTED. Chicago farmers only.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman is evidently not familiar with the method of planting wheat. They no longer sow wheat by hand, but they plant it now with——

Mr. OLMSTED. With a hoe? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I presume the gentleman plants all the wheat he ever plants with a hoe.

Mr. OLMSTED. I live on a farm six months in the year and know something about it. I sow wheat, but never plant it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say broadly, in answer to the gentleman's question, that in my judgment better service is obtained by following the plan which has been in operation ever since I have known anything about Indian affairs than would be obtained by putting these Indian police, farmers, matrons, and the like of that, under the regulations of the classified civil service here in Washington.

Mr. MANN. Of course, if the gentleman will pardon me, I knew what the gentleman's opinion was.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood you asked what my opinion was.

Mr. MANN. No; I was trying to learn from the gentleman what the opinion of the Administration was, the administrative department of the Government. What the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior is upon this question, as I suppose he has been before the gentleman; what the opinion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is—what the opinions of these two gentlemen, representing the reform ideas of the country, are, as to whether they want the places under them exempted from the civil-service provisions or apply the civil-service law in strict force as to places under everybody else.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I would like to read two or three lines from the Commissioner's report in answer to the gentleman's question.

There are connected with the Indian field establishment about 5,500 employees engaged in some capacity in the campaign of civilization directed from this Office. A little less than half the number are directly connected with the educational branch. The remainder deal more particularly with the adult Indians, their homes, their tribal relations, their lands, and their rights under the law. Substantially the entire corps is in the classified service, and appointments to it are made by selection from eligible lists prepared by the Civil Service Commission. Of the inelasticity of the system as applied to the Indian field, I spoke in my last report; but now, as then, the Commission holds itself always ready to study sympathetically the difficulties of the Office in this respect, and endeavors so to adjust its rules as to procure qualified candidates. About half the persons selected and notified declined appointment, usually on account of the inadequacy of the salaries the Office is able to pay under present appropriations, when viewed in the light of the everywhere increased cost of living and the scale of pay in private business for similar kinds of work.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will notice this bill as it is read he will find constant provisions in it, and constant provisions in the existing Indian appropriation law, providing for these appointments to be made by the Commissioner or by the Secretary of the Interior, which remove them from the operation of the so-called "civil-service law."

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee has received no request from the Secretary or from the Commissioner to change the plan.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has nine minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], but I trust he will not use quite all of my time.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman answer just one question? I would like to know about this: I see that telegraphing, telephoning, and supplies are put in at $315,000. Does the Government own those matters out there?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; that is to pay for the transportation, and so forth.

Mr. HARDY. That is for supplies and not for telegraphing?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is for transportation of supplies.

Mr. HARDY. It says "telegraphing, telephoning, and transportation of supplies, $315,000."

Mr. SHERMAN. That is an abbreviation in the report. The gentleman will find in the bill that it is transportation of supplies.

I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is granted eight minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from New York for his consideration. Knowing that the time for general debate is limited and that several other gentlemen wish to be heard, I shall not abuse the gentleman's generosity. I was deeply touched by his affecting references to the disastrous results of mixing Indians and liquor. [Laughter.] He might have extended his conclusions to many other mixtures in which liquor is the dominating, component element. [Applause.]

As to the Indians, we are now comforted by the knowledge that most of the good ones are citizens of the great State of Oklahoma, which, in addition to the proud advantage of being born Democratic, with a model constitution, also came into life as a prohibition State. [Applause.] That reflection suggests the importance of exercising the Federal power over interstate commerce so as not to interfere with that inalienable right of local self-government which insures sobriety, quietude, and good order, so essential to decency, progress, and prosperity. [Applause.]

Several States, my own among the number, have adopted State prohibition. Congress attempted, in the passage of the Wilson bill August 8, 1890, to provide for the exercise of the control of commerce in such a way as to restore the control of the liquor traffic to each separate State within its own borders, thus restoring the full exercise of the right of local self-government surrendered by the States in assenting to the constitutional provision regulating commerce through Congress. The Supreme Court, however, in holding that the word "arrival" therein meant delivery to the consignee in the State, uncovered a loophole in the Wilson law, which permitted C. O. D. deliveries and otherwise aided blind tigers to evade the local law. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], a distinguished Republican, and many other statesmen immediately went to work to secure an amendment which would cure the defect uncovered.

The reference, which we thought ought to go to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which the author of the bill was chairman and of which I am a member, was, for some reason unknown to me, made to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that has been the case for the last five Congresses.

I am proud to say, however, that many members of the Judiciary Committee, including Mr. CLAYTON, of Alabama, Mr. BRANTLEY, of Georgia, and others, have labored ably and faithfully to secure the enactment of that legislation. There has been much misapprehension prevalent in the country among both the saloon men and the antisaloon people as to the status of Federal legislation on the subject, due possibly to the fact that the Wilson bill, having been approved by the Supreme Court, it was deemed wiser and safer to retain its language and write therein the only amendment necessary to effect its original purpose. To the casual reader the language of the bill might convey the impression that it is an original suggestion rather than existing law. While many of us believe that the States have power to outlaw liquor and absolutely prevent its sale or storage in a State, even without the proposed Federal amendment, yet it is manifestly not only the right but the bounden duty of Congress to perfect what it attempted to do in the Wilson bill—withdraw the interference of interstate commerce from the protection of liquors as soon as they enter a State, whether before or after delivery. [Long continued applause.]

I find in the public press a letter from Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama, answering inquiries from his constituents on this subject. It is such a lucid, correct, and comprehensive exposition of the entire subject that I ask unanimous consent to print it as part of my remarks. [Loud applause.]

MR. CLAYTON'S LETTER.

What Congress has done and attempted to do on the subject of regulation of the traffic in intoxicating liquors may be summarized as follows:

1. Several years ago Congress prohibited the sale of liquor in the Capitol building at Washington and all other Government buildings and reservations of the United States. The Congressmen from Alabama and Georgia supported this proposition.

2. Several years ago Congress abolished the "army canteen," and has refused since to restore it. The Congressmen from Alabama and Georgia supported the proposition to abolish and opposed the restoration of the canteen.

3. Until the last Congress the law and the rules of the internal-revenue department would not permit the collectors of internal revenue to make public the names of those who had paid the special tax required of liquor dealers.

GOVERNMENT DOES NOT LICENSE SALE OF LIQUOR.

This special tax is often miscalled a "license." The Federal Government does not undertake to license the business of a liquor dealer, but requires a special tax of every liquor dealer. Across the face of each receipt for this special tax these words are printed: "This stamp is simply a receipt for a tax due the Government and does not exempt the holder from any penalty or punishment provided by the law of any State for carrying on the said business within such State and does not authorize the commencement nor the continuance of such business contrary to the laws of such State, or in places prohibited by municipal law. (See sec. 8243, Revised Statutes U. S.)"

On June 21, 1906, the law was amended so that each collector of internal revenue is required to place and keep conspicuously in his office, for public inspection, an alphabetical list of all persons who have paid special taxes within his district, and shall state thereon the time, place, and business for which such special taxes have been paid, and upon application of any prosecuting officer of any State, county, or municipality he shall furnish a certified copy thereof, etc.

I appeared before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives that had jurisdiction of several bills seeking to prevent the issuance of such special tax, miscalled license, in prohibition districts. That committee took the position that if the tax was not required in one district or community, say in a prohibition district or community, there would be no violation of any Federal law by any one who might sell intoxicating liquors in such district or community, for the plain reason that there would be no law requiring the payment of the special tax. Again, some members of the committee were of the opinion that to exempt any particular district or districts or particular State or States from the operation of the general law requiring the payment of the internal-revenue tax would be in violation of the Constitution of the United States, which requires that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

I believe that with the publicity required and made available of the names of the liquor dealers who have paid the special internal-revenue tax to the Federal Government, together with the strong sentiment which obtains in our State in behalf of laws that make for public health, morals, and good order, will prevent the nefarious business of the illicit dealer and will render it impossible for the "blind tiger" to flourish.

This measure had the support of the Congressmen from Alabama and Georgia.

SHIPMENTS INTO DRY TERRITORY.

4. As to the support of "some measure that will protect our prohibition territory from the imposition that is now being perpetrated upon it in the name of interstate commerce," you will readily understand that whatever legislation Congress may enact in this regard will be founded upon the commerce clause of the Constitution, which confers upon Congress the exclusive power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

Prior to 1890 many of the States had passed laws, some of them prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors and others regulating or controlling the sale of such liquors within their respective boundaries. It was notable that some years ago Kansas and Iowa attempted to prevent the carrying on of the alcoholic liquor business in those States by parties from the outside.

The Iowa law on this subject was reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States and was held to be unconstitutional because it was "essentially a regulation of commerce among the States, and not sanctioned by the authority, express or implied, of Congress." It was held in another case by the same court, as a logical sequence of the decision in the first case, that the right to sell and import intoxicating liquors from one State into another State in the original package could not be interferred with by any State law in the absence of Federal legislation removing the restriction imposed by the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States.

This clause confers upon Congress the exclusive power to regulate commerce among the States. This denied to the States the power to control or prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors transported from one State into another while they remained in the original packages and had not become "mingled with the common mass of property within the State."

In the last case which I have referred to, that of Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100), it was indicated by expressions like the following, that the remedy for this situation could be found in Congressional legislation:

"Yet a subject-matter which has been confided exclusively to Congress by the Constitution is not within the jurisdiction of the police powers of the State unless placed there by Congressional action" (p. 108); "hence, inasmuch as interstate commerce, consisting in the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities is national in its character and must be governed by a uniform system, so long as Congress does not pass any law to regulate it or allow the States so to do * * " (p. 109); " * * can a State, in the absence of legislation on the part of Congress, prohibit either importation from abroad or from a sister State, or, when imported, prohibit their sale by the importer?" (p. 110); "* * * essentially a regulation of commerce among the States, and not sanctioned by the authority, express or implied, of Congress" (p. 111). "* * * The State can not exercise that power (the power to regulate interstate commerce) without the assent of Congress * * * (p. 119); "the responsibility is upon Congress, so far as the regulation of interstate commerce is concerned, to remove the restriction upon the State in dealing with imported articles of trade within its limits which have not been mingled with the common mass of property therein if, in its judgment, the end to be secured justifies and requires such action" (p. 123); "* * * in the absence of Congressional permission to do so, the State had no power to interfere by seizure or any other action in prohibition of the sale by the foreign or nonresident importer" (pp. 124–125). "The court expressly held in this case that interstate transportation did not end, and the commerce clause applied until the liquor was 'mingled in the common mass of property in the State,' saying, 'Under our decision in Bowman v. Chicago Railway Company, supra, they had the right to import beer into that State, and in the view which we have expressed they had the right to sell it, by which act alone it would become mingled with the common mass of property within the State'" (p. 124).

THE WILSON LAW.

Accordingly, to enable the States to enforce their own liquor or anti-liquor laws, Congress passed what is commonly called the Wilson law, approved August 8, 1890, which sought to give the State jurisdiction over all liquors transported into any State or Territory and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, and to subject them upon arrival in such State or Territory to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police power, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and this law provided that such liquors shipped into the State or Territory should not be exempt from the laws of the State or Territory by reason of being introduced therein in the original package or otherwise.

This law was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States (140 U. S., 545). Afterwards the same court held (170 U. S., 415) that under the provision of this Wilson law liquor transported from one State into another remained under the jurisdiction of the interstate-commerce laws until they were delivered to the consignee, and that the State law was inoperative to reach them until they were delivered to the person to whom they were consigned.

The effect of this decision was to practically nullify the act of 1890. Under the law, as thus construed, liquor dealers sent out their soliciting agents and established agencies in other States, who canvassed the country and took orders for intoxicating liquors to be shipped in by the principal and consigned to the subscriber—sometimes the liquors were sent to the subscribers direct, and in other cases in the care of the collecting agent. By this means the business of dealing in liquors by foreign dealers was kept up in many of the States with impunity, and the States were powerless to prohibit or regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors by persons from outside of the State.

HEPBURN-DOLLIVER BILL.

To meet this situation the Hepburn-Dolliver bill was introduced in the Fifty-seventh Congress. I reported this measure favorably from the House Committee on the Judiciary on January 26, 1903 (H. R. Rep. No. 3377, 57th Cong., 2d sess.). The purpose of this bill was to subject intoxicating liquors imported from one State into another to the laws of the State into which they were imported on arrival within the boundaries before and after delivery. This bill was called up in the House of Representatives on the 27th day of January, 1903, and the explanation of it on the floor of the House was accorded to me by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. (CONG. REC., Vol. 36, pt. 2, 57th Cong., 2d sess.) After a short discussion, which I opened with a brief speech, this bill was passed by the House of Representatives with practical unanimity. It went to the Senate, and there it never received any consideration.

VOTE OF GEORGIA AND ALABAMA REPRESENTATIVES.

This measure had the entire support of all the Representatives from Alabama, who at that time were Messrs. TAYLOR, WILEY, CLAYTON, BOWIE, THOMPSON, BANKHEAD, BURNETT, RICHARDSON, and UNDERWOOD; and the measure also had the support of the Representatives from Georgia, who at that time were Messrs. ADAMSON, BARTLETT, BRANTLEY, GRIGGS, HOWARD, LEWIS, LIVINGSTON, Lester, Maddox, FLEMING, and Tate.

In the Fifty-eighth Congress the Hepburn-Dolliver bill was again favorably reported by me to the House from the Judiciary Committee. Under the hard and tyrannical rules of the House I was unable to get it up for consideration, as it was on the Calendar and could not be reached, was not privileged, and the recognition of the Speaker to call it up for consideration by unanimous consent could not be had.

At the long session of the last Congress (the Fifty-ninth Congress) the friends of such legislation endeavored to get a favorable report on this bill and failed. I am not allowed, under the rules, to give the proceedings of the committee. At the short session of the last Congress substantially the same bill was reported under the name of the "Littlefield bill;" but the bill met with the same fate that it met in the Fifty-eighth Congress, and because of the same reasons.

BRANTLEY C. O. D. BILL.

5. At the last session of Congress Mr. BRANTLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably H. R. 16479, known as the "Brantley C. O. D. bill," which provides:

"That any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, or other person who shall, in connection with the transportation of spirituous, vinous, malt, and intoxicating liquors of all kinds from one State or Territory into another State or Territory, collect on, before or after delivery, from the consignee or other person, the purchase price, or any part thereof, of such liquors, or who shall in any manner act as the agent of the consignor or seller of such liquors for the purpose of selling or completing the sale thereof, saving only in the actual transportation and delivery of the same, shall be subject in so doing to all the police powers of the State or Territory into which such liquors are transported and delivered, and for this purpose in all cases of the sale of spirituous, vinous, malt, and intoxicating liquors of all kinds in interstate commerce, where the same is sold 'collect on delivery,' the place of delivery shall be deemed and held the place of sale."

If this bill should become a law it would make the place of the delivery of the liquor the place of sale instead of, as is now held by some of the courts, that the sale occurs at the initial point of shipment. This bill went on the Calendar at the short session (Mr. BRANTLEY having been unable to get it out of the committee at the long session), and it was not reached on the Calendar, and it was impossible to have it considered by unanimous consent.

BELIEVES CONGRESS HAS POWER.

It is, perhaps, not necessary for me to give assurance that I shall continue to use my best efforts to secure legislation by Congress to the end that our own State laws in the interest of public health and morals and enacted in pursuance of the right of local self-government, shall not be violated by persons from the outside of the State, who shelter themselves under the commerce clause of the Constitution. I believe that Congress has the power to regulate the traffic in alcoholic liquors among the States, and that this traffic can be so regulated as to permit the States to enforce their own laws. The dealer, for instance, at Montgomery is not permitted to ship intoxicating liquors into a prohibition community within the State of Alabama. This is in accordance with the wisdom and power of our State and her people. The dealer, say, at Cincinnati, ought not to be allowed to carry on the business of shipping intoxicating liquors from his town outside of the State into a community in Alabama where the State has forbidden the sale of intoxicating liquors and forbidden their shipment from any other place in the State.

Very respectfully, H. D. CLAYTON.

Mr. SHERMAN. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few plain and practical suggestions upon the present tariff law, especially in its relation to the farmers of the country.

I come from one of the largest, if not the largest, agricultural districts represented upon this floor and one of the largest in population and territory in the United Staes. It is larger in territory than the old Bay State of Massachusetts. It is greater in area than the three States of Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Delaware all combined. The average Congressional district by the last apportionment had in population about one hundred and ninety-six thousand, but my district at that time had a population of over two hundred and sixty thousand, and to-day has over three hundred thousand, as the census two years hence will show.

With my brief experience in public life it would be presumptuous in me to assume to be an expert upon all the questions involved in the intricacies of the present tariff system, but as one directly and indirectly interested in agriculture, and as the representative of a large agricultural district, I have given much time and thought to this subject, as it affects the farmers of the country. I believe that I clearly understand the outrages that it visits upon them, and it is for them that I to-day speak and ask to be heard.

As citizens of a common country we are all individually and collectively interested in the success of the farmers, as their success and prosperity is a prerequisite to the well-being of the whole people.

George Washington once said:

The farmers feed and to a great extent clothe the human race.

James J. Hill, the great railway magnate, and yet a scholar, a philosopher, and a patriot, in his great speech at the Minnesota State Fair in 1906, said:

All the life that exists upon this planet, all the development of man from his lowest to his highest qualities, rest as firmly and unreservedly upon the capacities of the soil as do his feet upon the ground beneath him.

There must be a national revolt against the worship of manufacture and trade as the only forms of progressive activity, and the false notion that wealth built upon these at the sacrifice of the fundamental form of wealth production can endure. A clear recognition on the part of the whole people that the tillage of the soil is the natural and most desirable occupation for man, to which every other is subsidiary and to which all else must in the end yield, is the first requisite.

The welfare of the farmers is the welfare of the nation, and both self-interest and gratitude on our part should prompt us all to accord to them fair treatment and impartial jusice in the enactment of laws and in their enforcement.

The tariff laws have been a matter of political contention almost from the beginning of our constitutional government. Tariff duties were first imposed to raise revenue to support the Government, but were so arranged and classified as to incidentally afford protection to the infant industries of the country. I once heard William J. Bryan in a public speech say:

The advocates of protection at first claimed that it was necessary to enable the young industries of the country to stand upon their feet, but now these industries can not only stand upon their feet, but run over the feet of everybody else.

I will not discount the intelligence of the Members of this House by discussing the question as to whether the tariff is a tax, nor the kindred subject as to whether it is a burden borne by the consumer of the protected articles. To all intelligent and fair-minded men these are no longer mooted questions.

The American who goes to Europe finds upon his return, as I did, that when he reaches the American port the foreigner is not there to settle the bills, but the tariff imposed by the Dingley law is demanded and collected from the returning tourist. The result is the same, indirectly, if the American merchant buys and brings foreign goods to our shores, as he simply advances the import duties, adds it to the original cost, and collects it from the purchaser who buys them for consumption.

On one occasion, with my wife and some other lady friends, I visited Canada. The ladies purchased souvenir spoons in the cities of Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, and Quebec, and upon our return to the United States the revenue officer was informed of these purchases. He took charge of the ladies and marched them up to the "captain's office" for the settlement of the tariff duties. My wife was unfortunate enough to have been the child of Republican parentage, but I am glad to inform you that since that impressive hour she has been the best Democrat in the State. [Laughter and applause.]

The question of taxation has always been, and will ever be, one of the most vital and important questions in this and every other land. It will be so as long as human nature continues as it now is, with the burning desire for the accumulation of wealth.

All good citizens ought to be, and I believe are, reasonably willing to pay their just share of the taxes necessary to pay the expenses of the county, State, and Federal governments when honestly and economically expended, but no man really enjoys paying taxes, and especially when he has a well-grounded conviction that they are unnecessary and unjust.

The present tariff tax is not levied for the purpose of raising revenue to support the Government. It is made too high for a revenue basis, and is intended to prohibit imports and thereby lessens the revenue that would otherwise be collected. It is levied for the express purpose of protecting certain industries in the United States.

How does it protect them? It protects them by discouraging, if not prohibiting, the importation of the protected articles from other countries to be sold in this country in competition with similar articles manufactured here. The result is obvious and perfectly understood. Foreign goods are thereby kept away from this country that would otherwise come. The Government loses the tax that would be paid. The American manufacturer is given a monopoly, and he promptly and diligently proceeds to utilize and enjoy the license thus given him by the Republican party to rob the American people by the extortionate trust prices charged for the necessaries of life.

This is in violation of the Democratic creed of "Equal rights to all; special privileges to none."

Every man ought to be given an equal chance in the race of life. Thomas Jefferson once said:

> No man was born booted and spurred to ride roughshod over the balance of mankind.

Do you deny that the necessaries of life are made higher to the farmers of my district and the country by this unjust tariff tax? If they are not, then the object of the law has failed, for that you admit is the purpose of the law.

They tell us that the factories of the United States can not live without this protection, but I deny it.

The statistics show that the factories of the United States have not only prospered, but have paid large and remunerative dividends, and it is a matter of common information that the manufacturing industries of the country have enjoyed greater prosperity and are much wealthier as a class than the farmers, who are compelled by this law to contribute to their increasing wealth.

As further and more convincing proof that it is unnecessary, permit me to remind you of the fact that our American manufacturers are to-day selling their goods in foreign lands cheaper than they sell them here at home. My distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] clearly established in the last Congress the fact that Mr. Keene, a large dealer in watches in the city of New York, purchased American-made watches in Europe and, after paying the necessary profit to the dealer there and freight back to the United States, sold them at retail about 20 per cent cheaper than the trust price at which they were sold in the United States to the retail dealers.

Does any sane man believe that these goods were sold in the foreign markets at a loss? No man will stultify himself so much as to claim that. They simply sell in other countries at a reasonable profit because they come into competition with other countries and must sell at a reasonable price or not at all; but here they are given a monopoly by the Republican high-tariff law, strengthened and fortified by its natural offsprings, the pernicious trusts, and proceed to oppress the farmers and the consumers of this country by charging unreasonable and extortionate prices.

The answer to this unjust discrimination has usually been that they sell cheaper abroad in order to work off their surplus. I answer you, "Charity begins at home." [Applause.]

If the protected tariff barons have a surplus of manufactured articles to work off at lower prices, allow me to gently suggest the propriety of working them off on the mortgaged farmers of the West.

The question to-day is not one between tariff law and free trade, but the question is whether the present tariff law should be revised and reduced.

I am in favor of a tariff for the purpose of raising revenue, but would like to see at least a part of the necessary revenue to support the Government raised by an income tax, which I am persuaded to believe would be the fairest tax that could be imposed, coming as it would from those who enjoy the greatest benefit and protection from our laws by reason of their large possessions, and who by reason of large incomes are best able to bear the burden of taxation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am glad to see that President Roosevelt has accepted the Democratic doctrine in this, and has recommended in his message to this Congress the enactment of an income tax law.

Nearly everything the farmer buys is made higher by the present tariff law. The implements upon his farm, his barb wire, his provisions that he can not produce with his own hands, his clothing, and in fact almost everything that enters into his home for the maintenance, the comfort and the pleasure of his family, is made higher by the Dingley law. But the products of the soil that he produces and sells are not and can not be affected by any tariff duty imposed by law, for the reason that even with free trade no country on the face of the earth could afford to bring its farm products to this country and sell them in competition with ours.

President Roosevelt, in his life upon Thomas H. Benton, wrote these words:

> Political economists have pretty generally agreed that protection is vicious in theory and harmful in practice.
> In 1828 the evil was peculiarly aggravated on account of the unequal way in which the proposed law would affect different sections. It purported to benefit the rest of the country, but it undoubtedly worked real injury to the planter States.

This was before he became intoxicated with an ambition for office; before he advocated short spelling and long families; before he founded the "Ananias Club;" before he became the hero of the "big stick" and the "Godless dollar." He wrote then as an economist, a historian, and a patriot.

Mr. Chairman, I have sometimes hoped that the party in power would give some relief against the present burdensome tariff taxes. This vain hope has been indulged from time to time as the utterances of prominent members of the Republican party have confessed their iniquities.

The present governor of the rich agricultural State of Iowa made and won his third race for governor of that State upon a platform advocating a reduction of the present import duties. In one of his speeches, when discussing the outrageous mismanagement of some of the great insurance companies, he said, in substance:

> All the robberies committed by all of the insurance companies in all times in the past does not amount to one-fifth of the robberies committed under the Dingley law in one single year.

Mr. Taft will be the Republican nominee for President. I regret to so predict in the face of our personal good friend "Uncle Joe," who presides over this House, and who has his "weather eye" upon that empty honor. [Applause.]

Mr. Taft, before he became a candidate for the Presidency, was an advocate of tariff revision; but since he became a candidate for President he has modified his views to this extent: He now says the tariff ought to be revised, but he is not in favor of revising it at present, but after the next Presidential election.

If a man is sick and sends for a doctor, who, after diagnosing his case, pronounces him very sick and in need of a remedy, he would astonish his patient if he were to advise the policy of postponing the treatment until after the next chill. I heard of a case where a patient gradually grew weaker and weaker until finally his doctor said to him: "My dear sir, you can not live but a few hours, and if you have anything to say, you must say it now." The patient in his dying whisper said: "Yes; there is one thing I would like to say, and that is I am sorry I didn't have a different doctor." [Laughter.]

"Doctor" Taft, "Doctor" Roosevelt, and many of the other lesser doctors and leaders of the G. O. P. are free to confess that the present tariff law is unreasonable, unjust, and should be revised, but are in favor of postponing the remedy until after the next "chill," which, if we do not misjudge the symptoms of the patient, will surely come in November next, when the people will surely demand the services of another doctor, the man who is to-day the greatest living American statesman and the first in the hearts of the people—William J. Bryan. [Great applause.]

The President in his message to this Congress recommended putting wood pulp and other forest products grown in this country upon the free list, but no Member of this House is careless enough of his reputation as a prophet to venture the prediction that his suggestion will be heeded.

Your policy is to postpone the remedy, or, as expressed in Republican phraseology, "stand pat."

Mr. Chairman, with my limited knowledge of the meaning of specially selected phrases expressive of the principles and mistaken virtues of the Republican party I may be in error as to the correct interpretation of the words "stand pat;" but as I understand it you propose to stand by your present hand, good or bad, and depend upon your power to bluff the American people. That game is sometimes dangerous, especially with Missourians as competitors, who have become famous the world over for their inquisitive disposition on occasions of that sort, that leads them to the desire to be shown. [Applause.]

The farmers of the country are the first to suffer from bad or oppressive laws and the last to be benefited by remedial legislation intended for the relief of the people.

The last Congress passed a so-called "railroad rate bill." The idea was a good one and originated with William J. Bryan and the Democratic party, but the law enacted was not what the leaders of the Democratic party advocated, and has proved to be of little or no value. In the last campaign the Republican leaders and the Republican press boasted of this law as a monument to the constructive genius of Republican statesmanship; but it is a railroad rate bill in theory, that has failed to regulate in practice.

I live in a Missouri county and in the midst of one of the most fertile agricultural sections in the Mississippi Valley, about midway between St. Louis and Nashville, Tenn. Nashville is one of our chief wheat markets. The freight rate on wheat from St. Louis to Nashville by railway is 12 cents per hundred pounds, and from Charleston, Mo., to Nashville, only about one-half the distance, the freight rate is 16 cents per hundred pounds. The same unjust discrimination in rates obtains to all of the southern markets.

One of the faults of this pretended piece of beneficent legislation is that it undertakes to prohibit the charging of more freight for a short haul than a long haul, but adds the words, "under like conditions." When the railroad company charges more for the short haul than for the long haul it has but little difficulty in establishing the fact that the conditions are not the same.

Mr. Chairman, the claim has always been made by the Republican leaders, and especially the spellbinders upon the rural stumps, that no panic could ever come under Republican rule, and especially under a high-tariff law. Still the facts are that the three great panics that the country has experienced within the memory of us all have been under high protective-tariff laws.

The panic of 1873 was under Republican rule and under a high protective-tariff law. The panic of 1893, while under a Democratic Administration, the conditions of the country were such before the election of Mr. Cleveland as to make the panic inevitable. But even that panic, with all of its ravages upon the business interests of the country, with Coxey's army and other kindred expressions of dissatisfaction and unrest, came under the McKinley high-tariff law, which was not repealed until a year later.

The panic of 1907, which has now extended into the present year, is under a Republican Administration and a Republican Government in all of its branches and under the Dingley high-tariff law, the highest ever imposed and one that the leaders of all parties admit ought to be revised.

Some of our Republican friends persisted for a time in saying that this the present financial trouble does not amount to a panic, but Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, late Secretary of the Treasury, and now regarded as one of the great financiers of the country, frankly admits that it is the severest panic that this country has ever experienced.

In his speech at Des Moines on the 3d day of this month he said:

> Banks must have been sound, or widespread ruin would have marked the stringency of 1907, which is generally conceded to have been the severest the world has ever witnessed.

The present panic was more oppressive and hurtful to the farmers in proportion to their wealth than to any other class of people. It came at a time when their crops were ready for the market, and not only caused a great decline in prices, but for a time they were unable to sell for cash at any price.

In the face of this, the severest panic the world ever saw, brought about by a crude and an unjust system of taxation and an unsafe financial system, still the Republican leaders talk about the great prosperity of the country, and claim credit for all the blessings bestowed upon the people of the United States by a kind Providence.

I confess that we have had an era of prosperity, brought about by good crops here and famines abroad, with the prices of our products stimulated by the Spanish war and foreign wars. Still, I want to say that with all of this boasted prosperity, in the district where I live, which is as fertile as any under the sun, inhabited and cultivated by an honest, industrious, and a frugal citizenship, there is to-day a greater mortgage debt upon our lands and homes than ever before in the history of the country.

It is nothing less than partisan impudence to deny credit for whatever prosperity the country has enjoyed to the farmers and miners who have dug the wealth out of the ground, to the operatives who have created wealth in the factories, and to the transportation agencies which have carried the commodities from where they were produced to the places where they were consumed.

Sixty-six per cent of the exports from the United States to foreign countries consists of the products of the farms, and we all know that these are the indispensable agencies in bringing into this country hundreds of millions of dollars every year, giving to us the balance of trade and making possible the prosperity of which the Republican party boasts. [Applause.]

Unless it can be established that all this wealth is created by Republican brain and brawn, it is idle and preposterous for that party to claim the benefits which these products confer.

The fact is the country has prospered in spite of the Republican party and its oppressive legislation, rather than by reason of it, and the steady prosperity of the country might have continued uninterrupted by this severe bank panic if the Republican party had not overloaded our industries with excessive and unnecessary taxation and hoarded the proceeds in the Treasury at the time when the business interests of the country required every available dollar with which to carry on its immense transactions.

Mr. Chairman, permit me in conclusion to say the Republican party has proven itself inefficient and a false pretender. Its claim to popularity at the present moment rests upon its adoption of Democratic policies, which it formerly denounced, and it can not hope to retain power without promptly following the Democratic policy in tariff revision. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, after having listened to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, it may be of interest to hear from the Republican side on this very interesting question—the tariff. There is no one on this floor who is more thoroughly in favor of a tariff for the protection of American industries and American labor than I am.

The tariff is not alone to create revenue, but the schedules must be so arranged as to fully cover the difference between the wages paid to workingmen in other countries and the amount paid for labor in our own country.

The tariff of 1897 was an admirable work, and at the time was the most perfect piece of legislation along this line ever produced. But though it served the purpose in 1897, it does not cover the conditions in 1907.

There were some industries in 1897 that needed protection by proper tariff schedules to build them up.

These have since become strong and can now stand alone.

Conditions have changed in other lines of industries, and the time has arrived when some schedules should be revised—either made lower or higher or wiped out entirely.

Among the latter we find the lumber schedule—$2 per 1,000 feet. The supply in the United States has been so reduced that in order to meet the demand the greater part of lumber needed must be imported.

With the present scarcity of timber in this country, probably little would be cut if the $2 per 1,000 feet import duty did not afford that little extra profit.

How desirable it would be to give our timber a chance to grow, so that at least the next generation could be benefited thereby, is well understood by everyone. [Applause.]

The lumbermen of this country, many of whom I interviewed personally on this subject, have no objection to having the duty removed, and to do so would mean a saving to the man who wishes to build a little home, to the farmer who contemplates the erection of a new barn, and, in fact, to all who are obliged to buy lumber. [Applause.]

Articles manufactured of wood were exported from this country during last year to the value of $80,000,000.

If the price of lumber is reduced by removing the duty, manufacturers in this line will be better able to compete in the markets of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the steel trust of our country, with an actual investment of $360,000,000 and capitalized at $1,600,000,000, earns a profit of $180,000,000 in a single year, the time has arrived when that industry can stand on its own feet; no more protection is needed to help it along. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The oil trust's profits have been so enormous that they can hardly be expressed in figures taught in our common schools.

As was shown in the report of the Commissioner of Corporations, the profits of the Standard Oil Company in eight years amounted to $490,315,000, or an amount equivalent to $6 for every man, woman, and child living in our country.

Now, some will say, "What has this profit to do with the tariff, as petroleum and its products are on the free list?"

Many of us in our campaign speeches, and otherwise, have made this assertion. It came in handy when we wished proof that there was no connection between tariff and trusts.

We have said that the Standard Oil Company, the greatest and greediest trust in the world, had no protection.

I made this bold statement myself before making a thorough study of the tariff law of 1897, and I believe that the majority of those who made similar statements believed them to be true.

It served its purpose and silenced those who were constantly attacking the tariff.

I can well understand how such a misstatement came to be made, because section 2 of the 1897 tariff says that on and after the passage of this act, unless otherwise specially provided for, the following articles when imported shall be exempt from duty.

In paragraph 626, under section 2, a number of articles are enumerated on which there is no import duty, among them petroleum, crude and refined, but the one who reads the paragraph to the end will find that the thirty or forty other kinds of oils mentioned in the paragraph are actually on the free list, while petroleum is in reality removed from the free list by an innocent little proviso or joker at the end of the paragraph, which reads as follows:

Provided, That if there be imported into the United States crude petroleum, or the products of crude petroleum produced in any country which imposes a duty on petroleum or its products exported from the United States, there shall in such cases be levied, paid, and collected a duty upon said crude petroleum or its products so imported equal to the duty imposed by such country.

[Applause.]

That is the same paragraph, gentlemen on the Democratic side, that you had in your tariff [laughter on the Republican side] in 1894, and our people overlooked it.

The effect of this cunning little proviso is that the petroleum of the Standard Oil Company has greater protection than almost any other article appearing on the Dingley tariff.

The only competitor of any account in the petroleum business is Russia, which country has such vast resources that not alone is it able to supply all demands at home, but it has a great surplus to ship outside.

With the high prices of oil in the United States, the Russian producers of petroleum would be pleased to sell us part of their product, and sell it at a less price than it is sold for by the great monopoly in this country, but there stands that little joker in our tariff laws, charging the same duty as is charged the American oil in Russia—in some cases 100 and even 200 per cent. [Applause.]

I presume Russia is charging such a high import duty because it knows that if it were not for this, the Standard Oil Company would first ruin all the Russian oil industries by offering oil at cost if necessary, and afterwards charging extravagant prices to the Russian consumer.

One would think that under such a high wall erected against Russian oil not one drop would be sent into the United States, but some of it must have found its way into this country, because, from reports procured from the Treasury Department, I find that $35,963.65 have been collected at American ports on Russian oils within the last six years.

The rates charged were 5.4 cents per gallon on crude and 2.34 cents on refined oils.

There was sent to this country from foreign ports during the last six years 38,413,312 gallons, much of which must have come from countries that have no import duty on American oil, such as Austria-Hungary, Roumania, Dutch East Indies, and British India.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We have a bill pending now to repeal it, but we can not get your Ways and Means Committee to report it.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman the data at hand, and will he put in the RECORD a statement showing the duties levied by other countries?

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Yes; I will furnish you with that information at once.

The import duty in Germany is 6 marks per 100 kilograms on barrel oil, or 7.50 marks per 100 kilograms net on bulk oil. The total marketing costs, according to the information obtained from parties in the trade, amount to about 2 cents per gallon, which includes 1½ cents for marketing expenses and one-half cent for depreciation at 5 per cent and interest on investment at 10 per cent.

There are no import duties on oil in the United Kingdom.

The Danish import duty amounts to 3¼ cents per United States gallon.

The Netherlands import duty equals 0.67 cent per gallon.

The import duties on petroleum in other countries amount, per gallon, to about 1.7 cents in India, about 0.5 cent in China, about 4.18 cents (including excise tax of 3.8 cents) in the Dutch East Indies, and in Japan have ranged during the period January, 1903, to May, 1905, from 1.6 cents to 3.8 cents.

The Russian tariff bearing on oil and its products imported into Russia is as follows:

	Rubles per poud.
Petroleum, crude	0.30
Liquid products distilled from petroleum (keroene), photogen; solar oil; paraffin oil and lubricating oil; naphtha-ether, gasoline, ligroin, benzine, etc	1.80

(One ruble equals $0.515 and 1 poud equals 36.1 pounds.)

So great is the output of crude oil in Russia that in 1900, when there were no political disturbances, the production exceeded that of the United States by over 12,000,000 barrels. The remarkable feature of this is that the leading Russian oil wells are all within a radius of about 6 square miles at Baku, on the Caspian Sea.

The following table shows approximately the crude-oil production of the world at five-year intervals from 1885 to 1905, distinguishing the leading countries. The figures for the minor fields in the earlier years are imperfect, but the total production of these fields at that time was very small.

Now, let us see whether our great monopoly needs protection.

In 1903, when the average price of American oil in the United States was 10.9 cents per gallon, the New York export price was 5.9 cents per gallon, and the American oil was sold in London for 8½ cents per gallon, or 2.4 cents per gallon less than the United States oil monopoly was furnishing it for in Chicago, Philadelphia, or any other American city. In other words, our oil monopoly was selling its product cheaper to foreigners than to American citizens, even after adding the expense of transportation across the ocean.

In 1905 the price of oil in America came down to 9⅛ cents per gallon and the price in London to 5.8 cents per gallon.

Thus American oil was sold in London 3⅛ cents per gallon less than in American cities.

In the following table the margin between the price in the United States and the several prices in the foreign trade is presented merely for convenience in comparing relative movements:

From the foregoing statement which I have submitted it is to be seen that Great Britain and other foreign countries, on account of Russian competition, were supplied by the Standard Oil Company, in spite of expense of ocean transportation and other costs, at a lower price than American cities. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The following table shows by six-month periods, from 1903 to the middle of 1905, the average prices, less transport costs and duties, of water-white oil in the United States and standard-white oil in Germany, the United Kingdom, and Denmark, together with the excess of the United States price over the foreign prices, after allowing 1 cent for difference in the quality of the oil:

Comparison of domestic and foreign prices of illuminating oil, less transport costs and duties, 1903–1905.

Period.	Prices of illuminating oil.				Excess of U. S. price (allowing 1 cent for difference in quality) over—

1905—January to June..	9.2	6.21	5.03	6.08	1.99	3.17	2.12

These figures show a very remarkable excess in the American price above the foreign prices, particularly during the latter half of 1904 and the first half of 1905. During the latter half of 1904 the price averaged for the United States 10.3 cents, as contrasted with 6.92 cents in Germany, 6.42 cents in the United Kingdom, and 6.49 cents in Denmark. The excess of the domestic price, after allowing 1 cent for difference in quality, ranged at that time from 2.38 cents to 2.88 cents. During the first half of 1905 the extraordinary decline in the prices in the United Kingdom increased the effective margin between the domestic price and the price in that country to 3.17 cents.

This the company was enabled to do on account of that little joker in our tariff laws, virtually keeping out all foreign products and leaving our home people at the mercy of the greatest monopoly in the world.

That clever little joker in the Dingley tariff law has brought to the coffers of the great oil monopoly millions and millions of dollars.

From tables in my possession I am enabled to tell you quite accurately how much this little proviso, which in some clever manner crept into the tariff law, has been worth to the Standard Oil Company.

The entire production of mineral oil in the United States during the ten years the tariff has been in existence was 318,914,000 barrels of 42 gallons each.

Now, it is not denied that one-half or even more than one-half of this great production was consumed in the United States; but to be conservative let us call it one-half, or 159,457,000 barrels, containing 42 gallons each, in all 6,697,194,000 gallons.

By keeping out Russian competition the trust was enabled to charge home consumers about 2 cents more per gallon than it could have done if petroleum had really been on the free list. [Applause.]

Thus the profit to the Standard Oil Company on account of this proviso has been $133,943,880 within the last ten years, which is equivalent to a tax of about $1.50 levied on every inhabitant of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Whatever view may be taken, however, as to the advantage of a great combination in furthering the export trade—

Says United States Commissioner of Corporations—

It is entirely clear that the advantages derived by the American people from that trade are very small as compared with the disadvantages imposed upon them by the Standard's monopoly at home. American consumers might, for the sake of maintaining a large foreign trade and thereby benefiting American industry, be willing temporarily to pay prices a little higher than are charged for the same product abroad. That American consumers, however, should be compelled to pay prices so high that, when an immense quantity of oil is sold by the Standard in foreign countries on the basis of little or no profit, the total profit on domestic and foreign business combined should be 50 or 60 per cent on its capital, is an obvious injustice.

The prices charged by the Standard Oil Company in the United States are, on the average, altogether excessive and they have greatly increased during recent years. These facts, however, do not tell the full story with regard to the Standard's domestic price policy. The prices in large parts of the country are much more extortionate than the average prices for the country as a whole.

The prices charged by the Standard Oil Company for petroleum products in the United States differ widely in different places according to the degree of competition or monopoly. This is true of all classes of petroleum products, but is most conspicuous and most easily demonstrated with respect to illuminating oil and gasoline. After deducting freight rates, which often constitute a large element in gross prices, extraordinary differences in prices appear, (1) as among different States or sections of the country, and (2) as among towns in the same general vicinity—for example, within the borders of a single State. These differences in price are to some extent due to differences in the cost of producing the oil and gasoline sold in different sections and in part to differences in the cost of marketing. In many cases, however, they are due solely to differences in the degree of competition, and in other cases a large part of the difference in price is due to difference in the degree of competition.

The methods of marketing oil products lend themselves to this practice of price discrimination. Illuminating oil and gasoline—and the same is in less measure true of other petroleum products—are not to any large extent sold at central markets or through jobbing concerns independent of the refiner. The Standard Oil Company sells most of its illuminating oil and gasoline in the United States directly to retail dealers at their own towns. They are largely delivered to retail dealers at their own stores by means of tank wagons. Consequently the prices of oil and gasoline are in general purely local prices. The retail dealer is ordinarily not familiar with prices charged in other towns or in central markets, but even if he were he could not take advantage of lower prices prevailing elsewhere to buy oil there and bring it into his own town. The cost of transporting oil in barrels, particularly in less than carload lots, is higher than in tank cars. Moreover, tank-wagon delivery is so much more convenient than barrel delivery that the retail dealer is ordinarily unwilling to buy barrel oil even at a lower price.

The Standard Oil Company has established the system of tank-wagon delivery in the larger towns in all parts of the United States and in a large proportion of the smaller towns in the more populous sections. The business of its competitors is largely confined to a limited area and to a limited number of towns within that area. In towns and sections where there is no competition the Standard can charge monopoly prices, and by reason of the high prices thus obtained it can afford to reduce prices in competitive areas and towns to a point which leaves no profit for the independent concern.

Independent concerns are compelled to confine their business to a limited area and usually to a limited number of places in such area; first, by reason of the fact, already stated, that delivery in barrels is either more expensive or less satisfactory than delivery by tank wagon; and, second, because the limited volume of their business does not permit them to establish tank-wagon delivery in many places, since, in order to reduce the cost of tank-wagon delivery to a reasonable amount per gallon, it is necessary that a concern should secure a considerable volume of business in each town it enters. Only a concern with enormous capital could afford to establish a marketing system in competition with that of the Standard throughout the entire country and thereby force the Standard, if it desired to cut prices, to sacrifice profit on its entire business.

It is clear from these considerations that the Standard has an enormous advantage over any of its competitors in the marketing of oil. By a vigilant policy of aggressive attacks on competitors competition is kept strictly localized and scattered, and thus easily controlled. The Standard can make huge profits on its total business while reducing the profits of its competitors to a small amount, or even forcing them to sell at a loss.

I believe that the entire tariff should be revised at the earliest possible moment and made to conform to present conditions. [Applause.]

However, to undertake a general revision at the present session would be doing an injustice to the industries concerned. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I am therefore of the opinion that only those schedules be changed at this session which we all know are conferring excessive benefits on the few to the detriment of the great mass of people who labor for their daily wage.

It would require no experts to pass on the needed change in the schedule of petroleum—it is self-evident. [Applause.]

The greatest injustice will be done the American people by leaving in our tariff schedule the little petroleum joker. [Applause.]

Representatives and apologists of the Standard Oil Company have attempted to create the impression that the recent decline in prices of American illuminating oil abroad was necessitated by an oversupply of that product. They have also used the argument that foreign oil-producing countries have been competing with special severity against the American product, and that, in order to retain the volume of American export trade, decided reductions in prices were necessary. These arguments are not well founded.

It should be understood that in criticising the policy of the Standard in reducing foreign prices in recent years, no assumption is made as to whether prices were reduced to such an extent as to leave the Standard no profit. It may be that the profits of earlier years in the export trade were so high that in spite of the great reduction the Standard was still able to make a moderate profit in 1904 and 1905. It is, however, very doubtful whether any profit was secured at times in the leading foreign markets during this period of price cutting. The basis of the criticism of the foreign prices is not so much that they were in themselves unreasonably low, but that the increase in the disparity between the domestic and foreign prices was not justified by any change in conditions of supply and demand.

I hope since the abuses arising from the schedule have been called to your attention, that the same be wiped out by passing House bill No. 10488, introduced by me and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. [Applause.]

A bill (H. R. 10488) to amend paragraph 626 of section 2 of the Dingley tariff act, so that no duty on petroleum, crude or refined, shall be collected at any port of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2, paragraph 626, of the Dingley tariff act of 1898 ostensibly places petroleum on the free list, but in reality is so adroitly worded as to work out a high duty on petroleum, crude and refined, coming into this country, contrary to the belief of the American people in general.

SEC. 2. That by the wording of paragraph 626, section 2, a high tariff stands against Russian petroleum to the detriment of consumers in the United States.

SEC. 3. That the proviso of paragraph 626, section 2, which now reads, "Provided, That if there be imported into the United States crude petroleum, or the products of crude petroleum produced in any country which imposes a duty on petroleum or its products exported from the United States, there shall in such cases be levied, paid, and collected a duty upon said crude petroleum or its products so imported equal to the duty imposed by such country," shall be so amended as to read, "Provided, That no duty on petroleum, crude or refined, shall be collected at any port of the United States."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana thirty minutes.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I desire, with the indulgence of the committee, to submit to the House and, incidentally, to the country, my views upon a subject that is of much importance, not only to the printers, publishers, and newspaper men of the country, but is of great interest to every citizen, no matter what his occupation or profession. I have introduced a bill in this House, known as House bill 9188, which provides that the duty on printing paper, wood pulp, and all material used in the manufacture of printing paper be repealed, and that paper, wood pulp, and all material used in the manufacture of printing paper be admitted into the United States free of any duty whatever. My purpose in introducing this bill was twofold. In the first place, I wanted, if possible, to procure relief for the newspaper men of this country, who now have invested in their business nearly $250,000,000 and who employ 160,000 men and women, paying wages amounting to more than $100,000,000 annually, and who are now at the mercy of one of the largest and most heartless trusts the world has ever known. In the second place, my purpose in introducing this bill was to strike a deathblow at this unlawful trust, now capitalized at $40,000,000, a large portion of which is water, yet on this amount pays annually a profit of over $20,000,000.

I have no doubt but what at least 50 per cent of this large capital is water and that the annual profits of $20,000,000 is really 100 per cent on the investment. There are no men who contribute more to society and the general welfare of the nation than our country editors, and none who receive so little compensation for their contribution. The price fixed by the greedy paper trust for all material used by them is out of reason, and should not be permitted by this Government. Not only does it affect the country editor, but also the large printing establishments that manufacture all kinds of books, pamphlets, records, etc., that go into our schools, offices, and homes. Every time we buy a schoolbook, newspaper, or anything else manufactured out of paper we contribute to one of the most cruel trusts created by our present protective system. Therefore, this is a question that interests every citizen, because no one escapes making a contribution to this powerful corporation. There are many other trusts which have grown up under our protective system that are equally destructive of the people's interests, among which is the lumber trust. I have also introduced a bill in the House repealing the duty on all lumber imported into the United States, hoping thereby, to be able to save the American people millions of dollars and destroy another unholy trust. This bill, however, I shall discuss at some future time, and shall now direct my remarks to the subject first mentioned. It is not contended that the duty on wood pulp is necessary for the protection of home manufacturers, nor is it necessary for the protection of American labor. In fact, it is admitted that nobody receives any benefit by reason of these duties except a greedy paper trust, which is benefited to the extent of over $20,000,000 annually, wrung from the pockets of the people. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the elimination of special privileges is the paramount issue before the American people to-day, and this House will fail to discharge its duty if it does not proceed at once to repeal all laws granting such privileges. [Applause.]

The public conscience is awakened as it never has been before, and the people are demanding equal and exact justice to all and special privileges to none. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that whenever any product falls in the hands of a trust it should immediately be placed on the free list, and as there is no question about the trust controlling everything that goes to make white paper, I insist that the duty on such material as enter into its manufacture be immediately repealed. A correspondent for one of the leading Republican newspapers of the country, in an article on this subject published recently, said:

There is small prospect of Congress taking the duty off ground wood pulp or print paper at this session. The Republican leaders have made up their minds to stand by the existing duty on these articles, in spite of the fact that the publishers of the country are practically a unit in asking that the duty be repealed.

In taking this position the leaders reflect the attitude of the entire Administration, which is that the tariff must not be touched. Some two months ago, when a committee representing the American Newspaper Publishers' Association called on the President to ask his assistance in getting the duty on wood pulp and on print paper repealed, they found him apparently in sympathy with the movement, but still unwilling to associate any request for the removal of the duty with the tariff question. It was his idea that it would be better to base the request on a plea for the preservation of the forests of the United States. He followed that policy in making a recommendation to the effect that—

"There should be no tariff on any forest product grown in this country, and especially there should be no duty on wood pulp, due notice of the change being, of course, given to those engaged in the business, so as to enable them to adjust themselves to the new conditions. The repeal of the duty on wood pulp should, if possible, be accompanied by an agreement with Canada that there shall be no export on Canadian wood pulp."

In view of the attitude the Canadians have taken, the publishers are greatly disappointed over the form of the President's recommendation. They can see how much better it had been if the President had come out squarely and asked for the repeal of the duty as a simple tariff measure. Here was a trust which had put prices up beyond all reason, and yet the Administration was afraid, apparently, to come out in a flat-footed way and insist on the removal of the tariff under which the trust is enabled to thrive at the expense of the publishers of the country. They saw the point in the President's message. The result is that the Canadians are now taking steps to force the manufacturers of paper to come to the Dominion. One suggestion made by the Canadians is that pulp-wood exportation be prohibited; another is that a heavy duty be laid on pulp wood. In the event of either plan being adopted, the pulp wood of Canada would be made into paper on Canadian ground. Thus the Canadians would get the benefit of the labor now employed in the mills in the United States that consume pulp wood shipped from the Canadian forests.

The pulp and paper manufacturers of Canada have recently conferred with the prime minister and the ministers of finance and customs at Ottawa. They asked for an export duty sufficient to bring about the desired object, or that the exportation of pulp wood be entirely prohibited by the Dominion government, as is now done by the Ontario provincial government. The claim is made that the American companies, now operating extensively there for American consumption, leave only a small amount for labor and freight charges, and entirely denude and almost devastate the territory.

According to the census of manufacturers for 1905 the printing and publishing business ranked seventh among the industries of the country. It would seem that such an industry might get a hearing before Congress on a question of vital importance to everybody engaged in the business. The printing and publishing interests represent an annual product of one-half billion dollars. The newspapers and periodicals alone have a capital of $239,000,000 invested, of which nearly $100,000,000 represents machinery, tools, and instruments. They paid in 1905 salaries and wages amounting to $106,000,000 to 160,000 workers.

The committee from the American Newspaper Publishers' Association which called on the President in November explained to him the situation in great detail. It was shown in the statement that though the American mills are selling abroad at low prices, in competition with Canada, Norway, Great Britain, and Germany, the price at home is so high that Canadian mills can and do pay the duty of $6 a ton and make a profit in the American market.

The newspapers insist that the paper manufacturers who induced Congress to protect them against competition from abroad are under obligations to provide for the present and prospective demands of consumers in this country. To repress manufacturers or to starve the market so that the paper maker is in position to create a famine and to stop the supply to any publisher should rank as a crime. Many newspaper proprietors are unable to obtain any quotations for paper next year and do not know where to obtain a supply. In all the history of crimes charged against combinations and trusts, such a situation is unprecedented. It demands immediate remedy.

Newspaper publishers must take alarm when they find the paper production of the country united in a friendly understanding, especially so when they are told that they must pay an increased price for at least two years, as it will take that time to start new mills, and also because they are told that no readjustment of the tariff is possible until 1909.

Meanwhile the paper manufacturers are buying up vast timber tracts. In one of the four land offices of the Province of Quebec the International Paper Company has registered timber limits for 2,597 square miles. The Berlin mills have limits for 2,462 square miles. Consular reports show that a large proportion of timber lands in Quebec is held by American paper mills. The largest American paper-making concerns have acquired some of the finest forests and waterfalls in Canada, where paper can be made for $20 a ton, and they have been preparing for the alternative either to build other plants as soon as they see the time is ripe or to stop others from engaging in competition which would be highly profitable at present prices. At the time of consolidation the International Paper Company acquired ownership of 1,600 square miles of timber tracts in the United States. The newspapers are bearing the burden of this gigantic speculation in woodlands, because they are taxed to pay the interest-carrying charges on these purchases of timber that can not be marketed for twenty or more years. They are taxed to carry the load of overcapitalization that was saddled upon the International Paper Company, a capitalization of $43,000 for each ton of daily output; a capitalization that is $35,000,000 in excess of the accepted basis of investment of the paper trade for mills of modern construction.

It is difficult to recall another industry which has gone to such extremes in watering securities. The International Paper Company, with a book capitalization of $40,000,000, has a gross income of $21,000,000. Publishers maintain that if consideration be given to the inflated securities of the combined paper mills, then consideration should also be given to the immense capital invested in newspapers and periodicals. If the Government should assume that the labor employed in the paper mills ought to be protected, then it is urged that the labor employed by publishers should also be protected.

Every consideration of forest preservation and of enlightened self-interest impels the Government to keep the country's future wants in view, and to change that policy which puts a premium upon the destruction of great national treasures. The United States as a whole is consuming more than three times as much wood as the forests are growing. The destruction of the woodlands is progressing at the rate of 50,000 square miles per annum, or one-twentieth of the entire timber area of the United States. If nature were allowed to rehabilitate the earth in the wake of the lumberman, the reforestation of the country would not be alarming; but the pulp-wood industry takes practically the last standing tree.

The demand for pulp wood is beyond the ability of the country to furnish. An area as large as the State of Rhode Island is stripped of its spruce every year to supply the mills that make wood pulp. In the year 1906, 3,000,000 cords of domestic pulp wood were consumed in addition to 738,872 cords of Canadian pulp wood. Every material interest in threatened.

Rivers have been dried at the source, so that sawmills dependent on water power have been driven out of business, and other manufacturing interests have suffered. Farms have been given up in regions thus deprived of moisture because there was no longer enough water for stock or for home use, and disastrous floods in springtime are followed by droughts in summer.

The wholesale destruction of forests threatens the country with the calamities experienced from the same causes in Europe and Asia. Our lumbering methods, if continued, will entail baleful scenic, climatic, and economic results, injuring health, property, and occupations of all citizens and impairing industrial development by making intermittent the flow of the rivers, which are most important to agriculture and manufacture.

The members of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association have different views upon the question of the tariff, but they have a substantially unanimous sentiment upon the point that when the privileges and protection afforded by the tariff are abused by its beneficiaries to create a paper famine and to menace the seventh largest manufacturing interest of the country by oppressive combinations in restraint of trade, they feel justified in asking the attention of Congress to these facts and insist on such legislation as will prevent the possibility of a paper famine and the ruin of many publishers.

Apart from consideration of questions that relate to oppressive combination and to forest conservation, there is a larger view of the situation which should appeal to the responsible heads of government. Within the last twenty years this nation has turned from books to periodicals. It has fallen to the bottom of the list of nations in the number of books published. But it publishes 60 per cent of all the periodicals on the globe. The printing business represents an annual product of half a billion dollars and ranks seventh in the manufacturing industries. It has a larger number of establishments than any other industry. It stands for the intellectual growth of the country. It increases the facility for communication.

It is especially helpful to good government in that it promotes intelligence, uplifts the individual, and raises the standard of citizenship. If the combination of paper makers can succeed in its aims, it will stop cheap books and cheap newspapers. It will tax intelligence because the newspapers and magazines are the people's school and their library. All taxes upon paper are taxes upon reading, upon knowledge, upon the dissemination of information. Under any government such a tax would be oppressive and proscriptive. In a government, based, as ours is, upon the intelligence and resultant virtue of the people, it is anomalous and monstrous. To make newspapers artificially dear is wantonly to restrict the number of readers and so increase the sum of ignorance. When this is done or proposed simply to add to the profits of a monopoly, the injury to public interests becomes a matter demanding the intervention of the Government.

One solution suggested by the Forest Service of the Government is that there be adopted by the Government a system of forest management which will put a stop to the present wasteful methods in working up the product, and that a study be made of the utilization of wood other than spruce in the manufacture of pulp. Of course these might help, but the general view is that the real remedy lies in free pulp and free paper from Canada, Sweden and Norway, and other countries. With free trade in these articles the forests of the United States would be protected and the great stores of timber in these countries would be utilized.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is without doubt no question but what the publishers have a grievance. They are entitled to some consideration at our hands, and this House should be quick in passing a bill that will free them from the extortions of a greedy trust. The cost of paper as fixed by the trust is next to robbery. It not only affects the publishers, but it bears down heavily on the manufacturer whose raw material consists entirely of paper, and also exacts from 80,000,000 consumers a tribute for the benefit of a vicious trust now making a net profit of nearly 100 per cent annually.

I am not surprised that the newspaper men are asking Congress for relief. They are entitled to it, and this House will fail to do its duty if it does not give the matter early and favorable consideration. In this connection I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that while my sympathy is with the publishers and I shall gladly use my vote and influence to secure for them the relief they surely deserve, yet I believe it is fortunate for the country that at least some of them, who have praised long and loud the present vicious protective system [applause] under which hundreds of trusts have sprung up and have been permitted to rob and plunder the people, were made to feel the effect of a high protective tariff, through the extortionate and oppressive price fixed by the beneficiaries of this special privilege on the paper used by them. The newspaper men realize that the present high price of paper is due to the tariff, and at a meeting of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association held in New York some time ago passed a resolution asking for the repeal of all duty on wood pulp and all material entering into the manufacture of printing paper. Following this meeting and the passage of the resolution mentioned, the Indianapolis News, an independent Republican paper and one of the leading metropolitan newspapers of the country, published an editorial on this subject, which I now hold in my hand and ask that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks upon this subject. I am exceedingly anxious to have this editorial go in the RECORD, as it comes from a Republican source and voices the sentiment of all Democrats as well as many Republicans who have come to realize that the present protective system is designed to benefit a favored few at the expense of the many. The editorial referred to is headed "Too much tariff," and reads as follows:

TOO MUCH TARIFF.

Our newspaper friends of both parties do not seem to approve of the high duties on white paper and wood pulp. At a meeting of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, held last week in New York, the following resolution was adopted without dissenting vote:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that the duty on printing paper, wood pulp, and all material entering into the manufacture of printing paper be immediately repealed."

Here, of course, is a complete admission of the whole case against the protective tariff. The men who voted for this resolution recognized that the tariff was a prime cause of the present high price of paper; that it had much to do with maintaining the paper trust (supposed to have been "busted"), and that the price of paper was too high. Not only that, but they voted to invite the fullest foreign competition in order that they might have the benefit of a price fixed by such free competition.

We have no word of criticism for the action of the publishers. It is beyond question that they have a real grievance. The cost of paper is most oppressive and burdensome. Our friends are right in demanding relief. They are also right in holding the tariff largely responsible for the exorbitant price of paper. All we suggest is that these men, especially the standpatters among them, should concede the same right to others which they claim for themselves. The case of the railroads, for instance, should appeal to them. All over the country we are fixing freights and fares, and these are as firmly established as is the price of newspapers, and yet we compel the railroads, through the duty on steel rails, to pay a tribute of from $8 to $10 a ton on rails to the steel trust. Is that fair? Is it reasonable? Can anything be said for the steel duty which could not also be said for the paper duty? In both cases there is a monopoly, in both a high duty on the competing product, in both an exorbitant price. It seems to us that the rule in both cases should be the same. So of the thread duty. Recently the thread trust advanced the price of thread, which certainly is a necessity. It is a necessity used by the poorest people. And it is "protected" as paper is. Will not the publishers help to have this duty repealed?

Many cases might be given—lumber, clothing, machinery of all kinds, glass, building material, and even Standard oil. All these are protected, and the protection is furnished by people who can no more afford to bear the burden than the publishers can. These latter demand absolute free trade in the products consumed by them, and they do it simply for the reason that they believe that the tax imposed on them is unjust and oppressive. They want free paper because they think they are entitled to it. And they admit that the tariff is a tax, and that it is paid by the consumer. Now, we venture to suggest that the standpat organs ought to exercise some charity to other people, who feel that they are burdened and oppressed by tariff duties. The connection between the high price of steel and the tariff is quite as close as the connection between the high price of paper and the tariff. In both cases the connection is as close and direct as it could be.

Clearly we have here a very important concession. It is important because it points to absolute free trade as the only logical stopping place, for there is practically no duty that is in any degree protective that does not raise the price of an article that some man or some class must have, and if the resolution of the publishers is right it follows that every such duty should be abolished. For the publishers have no better claim than other people have. Logically they have virtually declared against the whole protection business. If they are, as some of them seem to be, unwilling to take their medicine, they ought not to expect other people to be willing to take theirs. If free competition in paper is good, free competition in all other products sold at tariff-created prices would also be good. Therefore, the principle indorsed in this resolution is hostile to the very theory on which protection is based.

The strength of the present movement against protection is due to the fact that large numbers of people and many industries are feeling the pressure as the publishers are feeling it. It is not a question of theory with any of these people—it is a question solely of self-interest. When men realize that more people are unfavorably affected by the tariff than are helped by it, tariff reform will come with a rush. As industry after industry demands the abolition of the special tax that presses on it the movement will grow stronger and stronger until there will be no standpatters left in the country. The manufacturers are already convinced—or many of them are—that the tariff costs them more than they get out of it. The newspaper publishers are on record as believing that they ought not to be compelled to protect the paper manufacturers. The industrial life of New England depends wholly on the possibility of getting some modifications of tariff duties. So, we think that all such demands for lower taxes and wider freedom ought, after the action of last week looking to free trade in paper and pulp, to be treated with consideration and respect by the newspapers of the country without reference to party.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the suggestion in this editorial that the men affected by the exorbitant price on paper, and especially the standpatters among them, should concede the same right to others which they claim for themselves, is a good one. There is no question but what the high tariff duties have built up gigantic trusts, controlling almost every known product and that the people have suffered immensely, in order that a favored few might pile up colossal fortunes off the sweat and labor of plundered millions. [Applause.]

In the name of justice, in the interest of humanity, is it not time we were doing something to forever put at an end the granting of special privileges through a system of tariff taxation? The ultimate accomplishment of this end rests largely with the newspapers themselves. It is within their power, if they will do so, to mold public sentiment to such an extent that Congress will be forced to turn its back on the demand of this special-privileged class and legislate in the interest of the people. It is openly admitted that the protective tariff as it now exists is an injustice and should be speedily corrected. To postpone revision until 1909 is unfair to the people, and gives the trusts that much longer in which to strengthen their position. Why should we wait until 1909? If revision is needed in 1909 it is needed now. If I had a pain in my stomach I should not want to wait until 1909 to take paregoric, but would take it at once. [Applause.] And the same argument applies as to tariff revision. We are all agreed that the tariff should be revised, and it seems to me now is the time to do it instead of waiting until 1909.

This system of tariff taxation has distorted the functions of a free Government into tools of greed and vehicles of oppression. Under the guise of protection to American industry, pretending to be a friend of American labor, the protective tariff operates as a cloak for cunning, as a shield for monopoly, a tax upon industry, a fine upon labor, and, finally, in its last analysis, it is a graft and a false pretense, conceived in greed and brought forth in avarice. [Applause.] So far as I am concerned, I want to go on record now as favoring the passage of the bill I have introduced in the House, which provides for the repeal of all duty on wood pulp and all material used in the manufacture of printing paper, in order that a vicious trust may no longer prey upon not only the publishers of the country, but 80,000,000 consumers who use their products.

I know it is argued by the gentlemen on the other side of the House that to pass this bill and do this simple act of justice would open up a discussion of the whole tariff question, and that is what they seem to fear. Hence the publisher is to suffer indefinitely because of the fear that if we attempt to give him relief others will also insist on being recognized, and this will ultimately result in a discussion of the whole tariff question.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what the country wants to hear. I am confident I state the truth when I say that 90 per cent of all the people, regardless of party affiliation, favor a revision of the schedules at the earliest possible moment.

Personally, I believe the tariff question is not a political but a business proposition, and should be taken entirely out of politics and dealt with from a business standpoint. In fact, there is too much politics and not enough business in practically all the legislation before the House. So far as I am concerned I shall discard politics in dealing with all questions.

While I am a Democrat and believe in the fundamental principles of Democracy as laid down by the immortal Jefferson, who for forty years led the Democratic party and stood as the world's most conspicuous champion of the rights of the people, yet I am not here as the representative of any political party, but as the representative of all the people of my district; and, so far as my service upon the floor of this House is concerned, I shall forget my politics and have in mind only the faithful discharge of my official duty. [Applause.]

I believe in political parties as a means of getting our ideas before the people, but I also believe the man who would make the interest of his party paramount to the interest of his country is not a good citizen. Therefore, in passing upon legislation before the House, I shall not stop to inquire whether it is of a Democratic or Republican origin, but shall lend my support, or withhold it, according to the merit of the question under consideration as I understand it.

In conclusion I want to say that the bill I have introduced, removing the tariff on wood pulp will strike a death blow to one of the most vicious of all trusts, born in greed and nursed by a protective tariff. Every Democrat in this House stands ready to vote for this bill, and I want to ask my Republican friends on the other side to join me in giving to the publishers of the country the relief they deserve and at the same time deal a deathblow to one of the most heartless trusts our nation has ever known. Will you do it? [Loud applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, the time of Mr. ADAIR having expired, Mr. STEPHENS of Texas yielded to him five minutes additional.]

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer a few questions, now that he has finished his remarks?

Mr. ADAIR. I shall be happy to answer a question.

Mr. TIRRELL. I have a few questions that I should like to have you answer. In the first place, will you give us the name of this vicious trust?

Mr. ADAIR. It is called the "International Paper Company," as I understand it.

Mr. TIRRELL. What per cent of the printing paper of the country does the International Paper Company manufacture—what per cent of the paper used in the printing of newspapers?

Mr. ADAIR. As I understand it, they practically control all of it.

Mr. TIRRELL. They manufacture 40 per cent. Can you tell me how many large companies in this section of the country are in direct competition with the International Paper Company in placing their product on the market?

Mr. ADAIR. I will answer your question by saying that I believe there is practically no opposition. The companies that you speak of as being in opposition to the International Paper Company are in opposition to that company just the same as numerous oil companies were in opposition to the Standard Oil Company. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TIRRELL. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I shall reply at length to the gentleman's argument later on.

Mr. ADAIR. I shall be glad to hear from you on that subject.

Mr. TIRRELL. I will ask a few other questions. What is the duty——

Mr. ADAIR. Shall I prepare your speech for you?

Mr. TIRRELL. No; I want you to answer these questions.

You have given us no data or facts. You have given your own ipse dixit. Now I want you to come down to data. Will you tell me what the duty under the Dingley law is on wood pulp, and what is attached to the duty in the law?

Mr. ADAIR. I would suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. SMITH of California. Let me answer that. I am a newspaper publisher and I am interested in this question.

Mr. ADAIR. I will let the gentleman answer the question.

Mr. TIRRELL. I have a few more questions.

Mr. ADAIR. I shall let you prepare your speech and deliver it on the floor of this House without expecting me to give you the necessary information.

Mr. TIRRELL. Can you answer the questions?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Here is a man over here who wants to answer.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman on my right [Mr. SMITH of California] five minutes to answer the question.

Mr. SMITH of California. For twenty years I have been a publisher of a newspaper, and know something of the cost of paper, and I do know that it is a fact that these last few years the price of paper has risen very much.

Mr. TIRRELL. Can you tell me what the price is now?

Mr. SMITH of California. I will come to that in a moment. Of course I buy it in a small way, a single carload at a time, and it costs me, laid down in California, about $3.60 per 100 pounds, which is from 60 to 80 cents more than I paid for it four or five years ago.

Now, in my opinion, there is nothing more nonsensical in the world than to charge this increase in price to the tariff. I take it to be a Democratic habit to charge everything to the tariff. I dare say that if you talk them into a corner on the question of race suicide they would say it was owing to the tariff or that the tariff had something to do with it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has a great deal to do with it, because the tariff makes it harder to live.

Mr. SMITH of California. On ground pulp the duty is one-twelfth of 1 per cent. That, according to my figures, would make $1.66 per ton on paper. That might possibly be charged to the tariff, whereas, as a matter of fact, in my business I have found that the increase in price has been from $12 to $15 or $18 per ton.

Mr. TIRRELL. What does that amount to ad valorem?

Mr. SMITH of California. The duty is not laid by ad valorem.

Mr. TIRRELL. It is from 8 to 15 cents. Can the gentleman tell me what the ad valorem duty is that Canada imposes against us?

Mr. SMITH of California. No.

Mr. TIRRELL. Twenty-five per cent.

Mr. SMITH of California. I am not advocating the abolition of the tariff on wood pulp, because I do not think the price is due to the tariff. The tariff of $1.66 per ton on pulp out of which the paper is made can not sustain an advance in price of $12 per ton. It seems to me that even a Democratic mathematician on the subject of tariff ought to understand that, and in my own experience I know that the increase has been as much as $12 a ton.

It is to be observed, also, that that increase in the price of paper did not begin to take effect until long after the Dingley tariff law was enacted. It ought to have responded at once to the tariff if the tariff was the cause. It does not seem to me that it can be proven in any way that the tariff has caused the rise of $12 per ton on news paper, and therefore it seems to me that there are other causes which will explain the rise in the price of paper in this country, and that removing the tariff would be merely to give that much of a subsidy or benefit to foreign manufacturers.

The question of the production of wood pulp from a forestry standpoint is another question, and is entitled to serious, fair, and nonpartisan consideration. I deny that the tariff is responsible for the rise in the price of paper, and I deny that the newspapers of the country generally believe that it is, and that they do not throughout the country demand the tariff on wood pulp.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of California. As soon as I finish this statement. I have had considerable correspondence with newspapers in my district this winter on this question. Somebody has been prodding them to bring me up to say how I stand on the question. When I passed the question back to them in this form, saying:

Do you desire me to stand for the repeal of the duty on wood pulp and at the same time repeal the duty on things which we produce in California? If so, then I will know where I stand.

Of course, the answer comes back—

We would rather be left in the condition we are, all things considered, than to go into a general tariff revision which might sweep away the protection California's industries receive.

I expect to go before the people this fall, if I get the nomination, on the proposition that I have not, and will not, favor the repeal of the duty on wood pulp, because, in the first place, it is not proper to revise the tariff by piecemeal, and second, I do not propose to disarm myself by advocating the removal of the tariff on a product I buy and undertake to defend the duty on things my constituents sell.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HINSHAW. I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of California. I only want time to answer the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman remember what the duty is on print paper?

Mr. SMITH of California. I have it before me: "Print paper, unsized and sized, suitable for books and newspapers, valued at not over 2 cents a pound, three-tenths of a cent." I take it that that is the class of paper we buy. I have nothing further to say, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I only want about three minutes. I am not at all astonished at the letter the gentleman from California wrote to his constituents, nor am I at all astonished at the manner in which it was received by those who believe in protectionism. It is not at all unusual to appeal to the fears of a man who is robbed by others through the instrumentality of law not to complain about the amount of the robbery he is suffering, on the ground that by virtue of the same law he robs others of five or six times as much. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, so far as this particular question is concerned, there is not only a duty upon wood pulp, but a duty upon printing paper. Both and the intermediate profits on both enter as factors in the unreasonable rise in the price paid by newspapers and publishers. Both of them are taxes upon the dissemination of intelligence. There is not only a tax upon print paper, but there is a tax upon linotype machines, and a very large one. I was the other day in conversation with an editor of a paper published in the State of Mississippi. He is the proprietor of the paper and he was up here attending the Newspaper Association, the members of which passed resolutions requesting the Congress to remove at least so much of the robbery of the tariff as robbed them. That gentleman told me that the linotype machine for which he paid $2,600 was sold by the American manufacturers outside of the United States for, I think he said, about $1,500. The last figure I am not perfectly certain about. I am about the amount he paid. At any rate, it was at a great deal less, some 30 or 40 per cent less. You Republicans have not only fixed a tax upon the dissemination of intelligence, but you are fixing a tax, and your own President is rebelling against it, upon the dissemination of good taste. You have a tax upon paintings, a tax upon statuary, a tax upon engravings. You are doing your utmost to retard the humanization and refinement of the American people. You want it to cost them as much as possible to get their information of science, of history, of everything else, and you want it to cost them just as much as possible of money to get the humanizing influence of the fine arts. Leave out for a moment this question of mere money. What justification can there be for taxing every man who reads, every man who has a child that goes to school, every Sunday school scholar in the United States who must buy a little catechism——

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. When I am through with this sentence I will—every man who wants to learn what the great geniuses of the world have exampled of art and its glories and its beauties, in order to enable a few men to add a few paltry dollars to the sum already in their pockets. Leave the money side out of it altogether and look at it solely from the view point of civilization and the culture and the refinement of humanity. How any man can defend it even for the purpose of retaining his seat upon this floor I do not understand; and among the very good things that the President of the United States has done—and not the least of them, by the way—is paralleling in his defense of the rights of labor this morning in that special message a little article written by Mr. Gompers for the Federationist—the labor journal of this town—among the very many good things which have been done by the President, not the least of them, is throwing the weight of his influence, whether upon the ground of saving the forests or whatever ground, against this wood-pulp and print-paper tax on the spread of intelligence among men. I am glad to recognize that in a previous message he tried to read you on that side of the Chamber a lesson against taxing by import duties works of art. We are behind the world in the fine arts and art culture. We have been engaged for years conquering the forests, and then we have been engaged in conquering the industrial world. Now, at the time when we begin to acquire the refinements of life in the arts we find ourselves faced with a custom-house obstruction to their free introduction into the country.

I now yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, I was going to ask if we were to conclude from the general tone of the gentleman's remarks that he is in favor of the repeal of the copyright law as being a tax on intelligence, also?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, Mr. Chairman, how in the world could the gentleman by any possible abnormality of intelligence imagine that there was any possible analogy between the two cases? [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] The copyright protects the product of a man's labor, and the highest form of labor in the world—the labor of his intelligence. The copyright merely says, "Thou shalt not steal my property, my thought, which is the result of my preparation and my work—my intellectual work."

Mr. SMITH of California. Let me ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman wants an analogy for a copyright, I will give it to him by asking him if he were in favor of abolishing the copyright, would be not also, by analogy, be in favor of abolishing the right of man to the property in a mule which had become his property by work. There is no sort of anology between the two things.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SMITH of California. I want to ask the gentleman another question. Let us leave the tariff question out for a minute and talk a little ordinary business sense.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I am talking ordinary business sense, the highest sort of sense, a civilized and humanitarian sense, and I am talking about the tariff as it affects culture and intelligence, and I don't want to talk about anything else right now.

Mr. SMITH of California. I think likely that is true. I want to ask this question. The gentleman has referred to the cost of text-books, and spoke generally of that tax being a burden on intelligence. Now, there are two items aside from the mechanical production of the book in its cost. One is the cost of the paper which you say is affected by the tariff and the other is the copyright. Now, if you are going to make intelligence as cheap as possible, why not go the limit? You say, and we agree, that the copyright is for the purpose of remunerating the intelligence and genius which brought together the thought contained in the book. That is right, we agree with you, we are in favor of that kind of protection. We profess to believe, and do believe, that the tariff is a protection on American labor also. Now you deny that, I suppose, and if you will look at this question divested of the tariff, as you want us to do, and want to make the means of intelligence cheap, then why not repeal the copyright law also?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will answer that question. I want to cheapen the dissemination of intelligence just as far as I possibly can short of the violating the law of God, "Thou shalt not steal." [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not want to cheapen it to the point of stealing the result of any man's labor, his originality, or his genius. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of California. Now, if I have any time left I want to reply to the gentleman's suggestion in regard to the linotype. Last winter I was bombarded with certain blue petitions, a letter, I suppose all of you recall, from newspapers, in which it was represented that linotypes can be manufactured for about $1,000, as I remember, the duty on which, they said, was 45 per cent, and they begged me to vote to repeal that, in order that we might not have to pay $3,000 for linotypes. If you can work that out mathematically for me you will do me a favor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman asks me if I can work that out. I can work it out very quickly and very easily. The minute you cut off foreign competition by a duty sufficient to do that—and the duty upon the linotype is sufficient to do that—then the minute competition begins at home between home producers, with the normal ultimate result a fall in the price of the product at home to one giving a reasonable profit, which would be the case, if nature were left alone to its own course—that minute men begin behind the tariff shelter to form combinations, which we call by the much-abused word "trust," and it is owing to this state of affairs the price is carried up beyond even what the necessities of the situation growing out of the system based upon the duty would itself require. And that process of first tariff, second trust, third extortion, also applies to the price of printing paper.

Mr. SMITH of California. I want to discuss that a little further, and if I am short of time I would like another minute. It was represented in this circular that linotype machines costing $1,000, plus $450 of tariff, or $1,450, did not come into this country from Canada or anywhere else and sell in this country in competition with the machine I paid $3,000 for f. o. b. New York, and that it was because of the tariff—a palpable absurdity as was ever held up before a presumably intelligent people. Now, let us answer the question in another way. Suppose you sweep the linotype tariff entirely away. Does anybody here suppose that a manufacturer in Canada can manufacture a linotype under the patents that have been taken out in that country and ship them into this country and sell them?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But a number of those patents have expired.

Mr. SMITH of California. But not enough to produce a linotype that——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They produce linotypes perfectly marketable.

Mr. SMITH of California. Then why do they not bring them in?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They would if it were not for the tariff.

Mr. SMITH of California. If they can manufacture and pay the tariff and sell in this country for $1,450 and get a workable linotype, I can assure you there is good business for them here, because I paid $3,000 for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LASSITER].

Mr. LASSITER. Mr. Chairman, so much interest has been developed in this discussion of the tariff question that I venture, with the belief that a measure of this sort to be enacted at all should be enacted at once, to ask the Clerk to read the resolution which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the duty of the Sixtieth Congress to proceed at once to a revision of the existing tariff laws.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the gentleman will permit me three minutes to complete a little of this discussion that has gone before, I would like to have it while we are on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, my Republican friend from California [Mr. SMITH], although in the newspaper business, seems unable to appreciate how it was possible for the tariff to affect the price of print paper, as most intelligent newspaper men in this country firmly believe that it has, and I think I can tell him.

When this tariff was first laid the paper mills of the United States were independent of each other, were in competition with each other, and every newspaper man of any considerable importance received periodic visits from agents of various mills, tendering him paper on sample and quoting him prices delivered at his place. When I went into the newspaper business in 1885 such was still the case, and for many years one agent after another visited my office and received my orders. I placed my orders with various mills at various prices, and during many years the tendency of the price, by competition, new machinery, and cheaper cost, was gradually downward, until finally the great International Paper Company, of the East, was formed. When that occurred the great company practically took possession of all this eastern country. And after it had held possession of this eastern country for some time there became apparent a gradual working agreement between the International of the East and the Wisconsin mills of the West, and they gradually divided up the country, until in a short time the International Paper Company never sent its agents into the Western States beyond a certain line, and the western mills never sent their agents into the Eastern States beyond a certain line. Some time after that the national combination was made more complete by the organization in the West of the great General Paper Company of Wisconsin, which bound together into one immense selling agency all the western mills, and made them, for practical purposes, as much of a trust in their territory as the International Paper Company was in the eastern territory. About two years ago, however, the General Paper Company was broken up by prosecution by the Federal Government. At once the price of paper in the West began to fall, and for a year or more western papers were able to buy paper at less than $2 a hundred pounds. Gradually, however, and secretly, because publicity was dangerous, the western mills have come into an operating agreement, not only between themselves, but with the International Paper Company, until it came to pass during the year 1907 that the sudden clamp was put upon the newspaper interests of this country, and, arbitrarily, almost in the twinkling of an eye, the price of paper was raised 25 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And to-day I am paying for paper at the city of Omaha just exactly 25 per cent more than I paid last year. That is an enormous increase. On my paper alone it amounts to $16,000 per year. That is the case not only with my newspaper, but it is the case with thousands of newspapers throughout the United States, North and South, East and West. [Applause on Democratic side.]

And now the gentleman asks me how the tariff has anything to do with this. I will tell him. If it were not for the tariff of 30 cents a hundred we would have foreign competition to hold the price down. I would be able to buy Canadian paper, which sells to-day in Canada at less than $2 per hundred pounds. The quotation on Canadian paper in Omaha is just a little more than the price quoted by the paper trust in Omaha, just sufficient to keep me from buying the Canadian paper. Take off the tariff of 30 cents a hundred on imported paper and the American trust would be forced to lower its price at least 30 cents a hundred, or $6 a ton, and I use over 1,500 tons a year. [Applause on Democratic side.] How great the enormous robbery is in the aggregate, Mr. Chairman, I am unable to say, but I know, personally, it is costing me at least $9,000 a year in my business. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. LASSITER. Mr. Chairman, before the committee rises I want to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I have just sent to the desk.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. MANN. It can not be considered in this committee.

Mr. LASSITER. All who object I trust will stand up.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LASSITER. Do I understand that consent has been refused?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order. The committee has agreed to rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PERKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. Mr. CULLOM presented a joint resolution of the legislature of Illinois, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 30.

Whereas it has been the policy of this country from the beginning to maintain a small Regular Army and in times of war to rely upon the patriotism of the people to rally as volunteers in defense of the national flag; and

Whereas it is a recognized fact that the civil war, 1861 to 1865, forms the most sanguinary chapter in the history of the world; that the Regular Army during that struggle was maintained at about 25,000 men, while the volunteers numbered more than 2,500,000 of officers and enlisted men; and

Whereas it is a recognized fact that the Union of these States was preserved and the national authority maintained by the patriotism, fortitude, and valor of the volunteers, to whom this great united people, now enjoying the inestimable blessings of a preserved Union, owe a debt of gratitude that can never be paid: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring herein), That we request the Senators and Representatives of the Sixtieth Congress from the State of Illinois to aid in the prompt enactment of a law in effect creating a volunteer retired list, upon which may be placed with retired pay, upon application, the surviving volunteer officers of the Army, Navy, and marines of the United States who served with credit during the civil war, such survivors now constituting a small remnant of that body of gallant men who led the Union forces to final victory.

Resolved, further, That in our opinion the precedents of Congressional legislation fully justify the enactment of this law, namely, the acts of 1828 and 1832, granting retired pay during life to the surviving officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and marines of the Revolution; the act of 1901, retiring Charles A. Boutelle, a volunteer officer of the Union Navy, with the rank and retired pay of captain of the Navy; the acts of 1904, 1906, and 1907, granting increased rank and retired pay to the officers of the Regular Army and Navy, based solely on the ground that they had "served with credit during the civil war," and the act of 1905, providing for the retirement of two officers of volunteers, namely, Gens. Joseph R. Hawley and P. J. Osterhaus, with the rank and retired pay of brigadier-generals: Therefore, it is further

Resolved, That in our opinion the surviving officers of volunteers of the Army, Navy, and marines who served with credit in the great war for the preservation of the Union are entitled to receive from the National Government honors and emoluments equal to those which had heretofore been bestowed upon any officers who served in time of war in defense of the country.

Adopted by the senate November 26, 1907.

Concurred in by the house January 14, 1908.

STATE OF IDAHO, DEPARTMENT OF STATE:

I, Robert Lansdon, secretary of state of the State of Idaho, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete transcript of senate joint memorial No. 1, by McMillan, to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, which was filed in this office the 2d day of March, A. D. 1907, and admitted to record.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State. Done at Boise City, the capital of Idaho, this 30th day of November, A. D. 1907.

[SEAL.]

ROBERT LANSDON,
Secretary of State.

Senate joint memorial No. 1, by McMillan.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent that—

Whereas a bill is now pending in the Senate of the United States providing for the granting of additional lands to the State of Idaho for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the State capitol and procuring of the grounds and accommodations necessary and incident thereto. Therefore, your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Idaho, earnestly recommend the passage of said bill, and respectfully represent that:

The general grant to said State for said purpose in the admission act is inadequate to provide funds for the erection of a proper capitol building. Much of the land selected under said original grant is arid in character and not of sufficient value to realize on the sale thereof the minimum price therefor as provided by law. Several thousand acres were selected which have since proved of little value, the selections having been erroneously made. There are yet many thousand acres of valuable public land in said State from which such selection could be made.

Your memorialists therefore earnestly recommend the passage of said bill so that land selections for said purpose sufficient to provide for the construction of a proper building may be made.

The secretary of state is hereby required to forward copies of this memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to the Representatives in Congress from this State.

This senate joint memorial No. 1 passed the senate on the 19th day of February, 1907.

E. A. BURRELL,
President of the Senate.

This senate joint memorial No. 1 passed the house of representatives on the 25th day of February, 1907.

J. FRANK HUNT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

This senate joint memorial No. 1 was received by the governor on the 26th day of February, 1907, at 10.45 o'clock a. m., and approved on the 2d day of March, 1907, at 11 o'clock a. m.

F. R. GOODING, Governor.

I hereby certify that the within senate joint memorial No. 1 originated in the senate chamber of the legislature of the State of Idaho during the ninth session.

F. S. WETTACH,
Secretary of the Senate.

[Certificate of certified copy.]

STATE OF IDAHO, DEPARTMENT OF STATE:

I, Robert Lansdon, secretary of state of the State of Idaho, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete transcript of house joint memorial No. 1, by Freehafer.

Which was filed in this office the 28th day of January, A. D. 1907, and admitted to record.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State. Done at Boise City, the capital of Idaho, this 30th day of January, A. D. 1907.

[SEAL]

ROBERT LANSDON,
Secretary of State.

House joint memorial No. 1, by Freehafer.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully present that—

Whereas a bill is now pending in Congress having for its purpose the granting of pensions to the participants, or their widows, in what is known as the "battle of Beechers Island,"

Now, therefore, your memorialists urgently recommend that said bill be enacted into law. Said legislation is necessary for the reason that the participants in said battle were civilian scouts enlisted and recruited by Col. George Alexander Forsythe, and were known as "Forsythe's Scouts;" that there were in number about fifty of said scouts, including their officers, and at a point known as "Beechers Island," in the State of Colorado, a battle was fought with the Indians on September 17, 1868; that said scouts and their officers were surrounded by more than 1,000 Indians for nine days and nights; that five of said scouts were killed and twenty-one wounded, and the survivors suffered untold agony; that only a small number of said scouts survive to this day, and that practically all of them, and the widows of the deceased scouts, are in straitened circumstances financially; that had they been regularly enlisted in the United States Army they would long since have been receiving pensions, but on account of the irregularity of their enlistment and the nature of the service which they rendered their country they are not entitled to pensions under the general law. For this reason a special bill has been introduced in Congress for their relief.

Your memorialists therefore earnestly recommend that said bill be passed in order that these men and their widows may receive that recognition to which they have always been entitled, but which they have never received.

The secretary of state is hereby instructed to forward copies of this memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to our Representatives in Congress.

This joint memorial passed the house of representatives on the 14th day of January, 1907.

J. FRANK HUNT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

This joint memorial passed the senate on the 22d day of January, 1907.

Mr. DOLLIVER presented a petition of Local Union No. 118, International Typographical Union, of Des Moines, Iowa, praying for the repeal of the duty on white paper, wood pulp, and the materials used in the manufacture thereof, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Brighton, and of the congregations of the Christian, Evangelical Lutheran, and United Presbyterian churches, of Chariton, in the State of Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

promote the efficiency of the State militia, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BURKETT presented a petition of the Nebraska State Horticultural Society and the Nebraska Park and Forestry Association praying for the establishment of a national forest reserve in the southern Appalachian and White mountains, which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

Mr. HEMENWAY presented petitions of Local Union No. 38, International Stereotypers and Electrotypers' Union, of Indianapolis, and of Typographical Union No. 35, of Evansville, in the State of Indiana, praying for the repeal of the duty on white paper, wood pulp, and the materials used in the manufacture thereof, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

VOLUNTEER RETIRED LIST.

Mr. BURROWS. I present certain data which has been furnished me relative to the bill (S. 1676) to create in the War Department a roll to be known as the "volunteer retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers of the United States Volunteer Army of the civil war, and for other purposes. It is very important, I think, and I ask that the paper be printed as a document, printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the paper was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed as a document and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D C., January 30, 1908.

DEAR SIR: Upon the introduction of S. 1676, a bill to create in the War Department a roll to be known as the "volunteer retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers of the United States Volunteer Army of the civil war, and for other purposes, introduced by yourself December 9, 1907, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, you stated that to present this bill intelligently to the committee it was necessary that a statement be prepared giving the number, rank, and age of these surviving officers, so that the cost of this measure could be definitely ascertained. You requested that such a statement should be prepared, and I now have the honor of presenting you with the information desired in tabular form:

Statement of a classification according to rank and age of surviving volunteer officers of the civil war eligible to the provisions of H. R. 6288, together with an estimate of the first year's cost of said bills.

Rank.	Number.	Retiring rate.	Age 70 and over.	Age 64 and under 70.	Total amount.
Major-general	2	$2,000	$4,000		$4,000
Brigadier-general	28	2,000	56,000		56,000
Colonel	129	2,000	258,000		258,000
Do	22	1,750		$38,500	38,500
Lieutenant-colonel	136	2,000	272,000		272,000
Do	59	1,500		88,500	88,500
Major	197	1,875	369,375		369,375
Do	112	1,250		140,000	140,000
Captain	1,377	1,350	1,439,950		1,439,950
Do	1,256	900		1,133,100	1,133,100
First lieutenant	1,026	1,125	1,154,250		1,154,250
Do	1,207	750		905,250	905,250
Second lieutenant	480	1,050	504,000		504,000
Do	683	700		480,200	480,200
Various ranks, Navy	150	1,050	157,500		157,500
Total	6,867				7,000,625

Deduct 6,867 pensions at $145.60 average pension of all rates for fiscal year 1907	$999,835
Of the above-described officers 3,376 are 70 years and upward, and many are 80 years of age; a number receive pensions for wounds received in battle and others by special acts of Congress. The average of these will no doubt be more than $20 per month and thus increase the deduction of pensions to the amount of	350,000
Estimated cost of bill for those eligible to its provisions		5,651,790

In addition to the above number, there are 383 officers under 64 years of age, who, upon arriving at that age, will be entitled to retirement.

In submitting the above figures for the consideration of yourself and the Committee on Military Affairs, I will state that the presentation of the question to the Fifty-ninth Congress resulted in earnest cooperation among these surviving officers throughout the country to secure its proper presentation to the Sixtieth Congress. A general committee and many State and local committees were organized for the purpose of united action. Petitions for officers were widely distributed and there was a prompt response. The aid of the Grand Army posts and of the Loyal Legion commanderies was invoked. As a result of most diligent effort, the foregoing statement of the number, rank, and age of the surviving officers is presented. My deliberate opinion is that these figures can be confidently relied upon as a basis for legislation.

I respectfully invite an examination of the many petitions of these veteran officers presented to Congress. It will be found that the great body of these men are of long service, and that nearly half of them are over 70 years of age: many are over 80 years.

I also call attention to the petitions of citizens from all parts of the country memorializing Congress for the enactment of this law. These petitions are from the substantial men of the various cities and communities where they have been signed. The public press is behind this measure, indorsing it as wise and just.

It is obvious that the enactment of this bill into law will meet the hearty approval of the people.

I invite attention to the acts of 1828 and 1832, copies of which are added hereto as an appendix.

It will be seen that these statutes granted to the surviving officers, noncommissioned officers, musicians, soldiers, and Indian spies of the continental line, or State troops, volunteers or militia, who at one or more terms had served two years during the war of the Revolution, full pay during life according to rank, not to exceed the pay of a captain in said line, and for service less than two years and not less than six months an amount proportioned to the length of his service as it compared with the period of two years.

I now wish to call particular attention to the recent legislation of the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Congresses bearing upon the subject. First, to the act of March, 1905, by the provisions of which, Generals Joseph R. Hawley and P. J. Osterhaus were retired with the rank and retired pay of brigadier-general. These officers had served as officers of volunteers during the civil war, had never been commissioned in the Regular Army, and had been mustered out of the service at the close of the civil war. Second, to the act of April 23, 1904, which provided that "any officer below the grade of brigadier-general who served with credit as an officer or an enlisted man in the regular or volunteer forces during the civil war prior to April 9, 1865 * * * and who has heretofore been, or may hereafter be retired * * * may * * * be placed on the retired list of the Army with the rank and retired pay of one grade above that actually held by him at the time of retirement." Upon an examination of the Army Register of 1905 it will be found that 354 officers on the retired list were reretired with increased rank and retired pay as follows: Ninety-two colonels were retired as brigadier-generals, 43 lieutenant-colonels were reretired as colonels, 49 majors as lieutenant-colonels, 110 captains as majors, 39 first lieutenants as captains, 6 second lieutenants as first lieutenants, and 15 chaplains as majors; 254 of these officers had served in the volunteer army of the civil war. In 1906 the principle of the foregoing act was applied to officers of the Navy, and in March, 1907, provision was made for the retirement of brigadier-generals as major-generals who had performed creditable service during the civil war, and a number of brigadier-generals have been retired with increased rank and retired pay.

Thus it is seen that under existing law every surviving officer of the Regular Army, from second lieutenant to brigadier-general, and of the Regular Navy, of corresponding rank, who "served with credit during the civil war" have been or will be retired with one grade increased rank and retired pay.

This honorable recognition to officers of the Regular Army and Navy was not granted because of long service in the Regular Army and Navy, but solely on the ground that these officers had "served with credit during the civil war."

In view of these acts, and as Congress since the close of the civil war has not enacted any legislation in recognition of volunteer officers who served with credit in that great war, the question naturally arises:

Shall it become the settled policy of Congress to establish by law a higher standard of merit for officers of the Regular Army and Navy for the performance of "creditable service during the civil war" than for officers of the Volunteer Army and Navy for the performance of long and equally creditable service during said war?

In behalf of these 6,867 surviving officers of the Army and Navy of the civil war I respectfully submit that their services to the country entitle them to consideration equal to that bestowed by Congress upon any officers who ever defended the national flag, and I insist that anything short of this would be a serious reflection upon their patriotism, ability, and service, and would not be creditable to the great Republic whose existence and authority they assisted to maintain.

Having given the subject of the cost of this measure most careful consideration, I state without reservation that, in my opinion, the annual cost at the outset will not exceed the estimate, namely, $5,651,790. It must be recognized by all intelligent persons that, considering the advanced age of the majority of these surviving officers, the roll would not continue as an expense to the Government for many years.

And reasoning upon the same facts, if the Senators and Representatives of the Sixtieth Congress are in sympathy with the sentiments of Senator Webster, expressed May, 1828, in respect to the bill enacted at that time that "It is * * * a mixed claim of faith and public gratitude, of justice and honorable bounty, of merit and benevolence," the will, like Mr. Webster, declare: "What we do should be done quickly."

As to the wisdom and justice of this measure there can scarcely be found a dissenting voice.

As to the ability of the Government without embarrassment to meet this expense there can be no question.

Never in the history of the world has any nation or any people reached so high a plane of prosperity and wealth as this great united nation and people.

The preservation of the Union gave an opportunity and impulse to the tremendous progress which has been made during the past forty-two years which has placed this country in the lead of all nations in respect to agriculture, mining, manufactures, internal commerce, and wealth.

With exports amounting to $1,853,718,000 and imports amounting to $1,431,421,000; with a paper circulation of $2,772,956,000, every dollar of which is based upon the national credit, and with a redemption fund in the Treasury of gold and silver amounting to $1,425,116,000; with a system of revenue which not only provided ample means to pay the current expenses of Government, but enabled the Treasury from 1865 to 1892 to pay $4,216,788,999 principle and interest on the public debt, and which has provided the Treasury a present available cash balance of $260,628,885, of which $240,278,701 is on deposit in national banks and subject to the draft of the Treasurer of the United States, it is obvious that the suggested appropriation of $5,651,790 will not embarrass the Treasury in the least.

In behalf of these surviving officers of volunteers of the civil war I have the honor to request that you will refer this letter to the honorable Committee on Military Affairs and bespeak an early and favorable report of your bill.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

GREEN B. RAUM, Chairman.
S. L. GLASGOW, Secretary.

INVESTIGATION OF ACCIDENTS IN MINES.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I intended to submit an amendment proposing to appropriate $120,000 for establishing and equipping a station for the investigation of methods of minimizing accidents and dangers in mines, etc., as an amendment to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which has just been reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE.]

I find that several Senators object to the amendment on the ground that it is not a deficiency; but I desire, for the information of the Senate, to offer the amendment and have it printed along with a statment—an incomplete statement—relating to fatal accidents in the mines of the country. I hope the Committee on Mines and Mining will give the matter consideration. I shall present it in another form later in the session. I should like to have the amendment printed in the RECORD, along with the statement which I furnish, and referred, with the accompanying statement, to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

There being no objection, the proposed amendment and the accompanying statement were referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. HEMENWAY to the bill (H. R. 14706) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for prior years, and for other purposes, viz: On page 26, after line 11 and before line 12, insert the following:

For establishing and equipping a station for the investigation of methods of minimizing accidents and dangers in mines, to continue available during the fiscal year 1909, the sum of $120,000.

For the investigation of mine accidents and their prevention and the improvement of mine conditions, to continue available during the fiscal year 1909, the sum of $60,000.

For the investigation of methods of preventing waste in the mining, extracting, and utilization of ores and mineral substances other than fuels, to continue available during the fiscal year 1909, the sum of $20,000.

Incomplete statement of the fatal and nonfatal accidents in mines during the month of January, 1908, as gathered from newspaper clippings sent to the Technologic Branch of the United States Geological Survey:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause such survey and examination to be made of the existing canal and locks at the falls of the Willamette River at Oregon City, Oreg., as may be necessary to ascertain what sum of money at present prices of labor and material should be appropriated by Congress, in addition to the appropriation already made by the State of Oregon therefor, to enable the Government to acquire said canal and locks and properly repair the same.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

BITTER ROOT VALLEY LANDS, MONTANA.

Mr. DIXON. Before the close of the morning hour, on account of the urgent necessity for the proposed legislation, I should like to call up by unanimous consent the bill (S. 206) to extend the provisions of the mining laws of the United States to certain lands situated in the Bitter Root Valley, State of Montana, above the mouth of the Lo Lo Fork of the Bitter Root River.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 5, before the word "lands," to strike out the words "all the" and insert "the undisposed of," so as to read:

That all the provisions of the present mining laws of the United States are hereby extended and made applicable to the undisposed of lands in the Bitter Root Valley, State of Montana, above the mouth of the Lo Lo fork of the Bitter Root River, designated in the act of June 5, 1872.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That all mining locations and entries heretofore made or attempted to be made upon said lands shall be determined by the Department of the Interior as if said lands had been subject to mineral location and entry at the time such locations and entries were made or attempted to be made: And provided further, That this act shall not be applicable to lands withdrawn for administration sites for use of the Forest Service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INQUIRY AS TO CERTAIN WESTERN LAND GRANTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. TILLMAN on the 31st ultimo, as follows:

Whereas at divers times various railroads and other corporations have received large grants of public lands of the United States, under and by virtue of acts of the Congress, containing conditions to the effect that such lands should be sold to actual settlers only, or in quantities not exceeding for any one purchaser a limit fixed by the act relating thereto, or at a price per acre not greater than an amount mentioned in the act authorizing such grant, to the end that such lands might promptly become the homes of citizens of the United States; and

Whereas it is currently reported and widely believed that the Department of Justice has information to the effect that certain of the corporations aforesaid, or their alleged successors in title, having obtained colorable title to large tracts of land within a State or States of the Pacific slope by virtue of the grants above mentioned, and still holding considerable portions thereof, have violated or evaded the equitable and salutary conditions so as aforesaid imposed by the Congress upon such grants for the public good; yet the Senate is not advised that any action has been taken by the Department of Justice to enforce the said conditions or restore the said lands to the public domain: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate what information, if any, has been received, and what action, if any, has been taken by the Department of Justice with respect to the matters and things in the preamble to this resolution set forth.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ALASKA-YUKON-PACIFIC EXPOSITION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. PILES. I ask that the bill (S. 627) to encourage the holding of an Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition at the city of Seattle, State of Washington, in the year 1909, be laid before the Senate, that I may make some remarks thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Chair lays the bill before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. Rule IX, Order of Business 39, a bill (S. 627) to encourage the holding of an Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition at the city of Seattle, State of Washington, in the year 1909.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, in calling the attention of the Senate to the bill which has just been reported, I desire to state at the outset that the Government is not asked to finance this proposition or to give any assistance, by way of a loan, to the exposition. The Government is simply invited to participate as are foreign countries and the several States of the Union. The bill especially provides, by section 11, that the Government shall not, in any manner or under any circumstances, make a loan, directly or indirectly, to the exposition or for its benefit, nor appropriate any money other than the sums provided for in this bill. The Government is asked to appropriate $700,000 for participation in the exposition, divided as follows: Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for Government exhibits, including the special fisheries exhibit, the special life-saving exhibit, and the special exhibit of the Bureau of the American Republics; $100,000 for Alaskan exhibits; $25,000 for Hawaiian exhibits, and $25,000 for Philippine exhibits—a total of $400,000 for exhibits; and $300,000 for buildings. The buildings provided for in the bill are a Government building, an irrigation and biograph building, a fisheries building complete, and buildings for the exhibits from Alaska, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands.

PURPOSES OF THE EXPOSITION.

The people of the Pacific Northwest, feeling that a concerted effort should be made to stimulate our commerce in the Pacific Ocean countries, and to make known the wonderful resources of Alaska and our island possessions and the possibilities of that great western country, concluded to hold an exposition at the city of Seattle, commencing on the 1st day of June, 1909, and ending on the 15th day of October of that year. An exposition company was formed at Seattle with a capital stock of $500,000. The people of that city were asked to subscribe to this capital stock. A day was set apart for that purpose, and, on the day named, subscriptions to the amount of $654,000 were tendered by our local citizens. A committee of business men carefully examined the offers made, and, after eliminating all doubtful ones, there remained subscriptions to the amount of $625,000. The capital stock of the company having been oversubscribed by the citizens of Seattle in a single day, the same was thereafter increased to $800,000. So far no subscriptions have been invited to the unsubscribed $175,000 of increased capital stock. The subscriptions are payable in four equal installments. So far $412,000 has been paid in cash. The remaining installment is not payable until April of this year.

APPROPRIATIONS BY WASHINGTON AND OTHER STATES.

The State of Washington has appropriated $1,000,000 in aid of this enterprise, and our legislature passed an act authorizing the several counties of the State to levy a tax for the purpose of raising a fund for individual county exhibits. Under this act the sum of $278,000 will be raised. So far, I am credibly informed, some $200,000 has been provided in this manner for the purposes indicated, making a total of over $2,000,000 which the people of the State of Washington alone will contribute toward this great enterprise.

The exposition is to be held upon the university grounds of the State, at the city of Seattle, which front, from a westerly view, on Lake Union, mirrored in the heart of the city, and from an easterly view, on Lake Washington.

The State of California has appropriated $100,000 for participation in the exposition, and the State of Oregon a like sum for that purpose. Other States have made appropriations, and the management feel confident that all of the Western States and a great many of those on the Atlantic seaboard will be handsomely represented. And I am reliably informed that the Canadian government will make an appropriation in behalf of the Canadian Yukon territory as soon as Congress recognizes the exposition by providing for participation therein.

We have extended the Government an invitation to participate with us in the exposition, and I do not believe that it can afford to refuse to accept, or that it will refuse to accept, our invitation. It would be a most unusual thing for the Government to refuse to participate in an exposition of this character, held for the purpose of developing our trade along lines which have been already too long neglected.

BENEFIT TO HAWAII AND THE PHILIPPINES.

The people of Hawaii and the Philippine Islands are exceedingly anxious to participate, and I am sure it would be most gratifying to them to know that Congress had manifested a disposition toward granting their wishes in that regard.

I visited the Hawaiian Islands in company with a Congressional party last summer. The people of the islands were exceedingly gratified to see us because they felt that, by our visit in a body, the continental country was at last becoming personally interested in their welfare. The people out there are striving to make known their wonderful resources and to invite an immigration which will aid in developing the islands along agricultural and other lines which may be profitably pursued by small investors.

The exposition will tend to bring about a better feeling between the people of the islands and the continental country. In fact the whole country will be greatly benefited by an exposition of this character, and especially Alaska, which is, after all, one of the richest portions of our domain.

And now, Mr. President, what of Alaska, with its more than 590,000 square miles of territory and 26,000 miles of coast line? Its purchase in 1867 from the Russian Government for $7,200,000 was bitterly opposed by some of our then most distinguished statesmen upon the ground, among others, that it was an inhospitable and worthless land.

EARLY OPINIONS OF ALASKA.

In view of its wonderful productivity, it may be of interest to notice briefly what was said by some of our leading public men respecting Alaska at the time the treaty was negotiated; and to also say something of its commerce, climate, and agricultural and general resources.

Mr. Washburn, of Wisconsin, speaking in the House in December, 1867, with respect to Mr. Seward's negotiation of the treaty, said:

> * * * No man in the United States had asked for the negotiation of this treaty or that that country should be acquired. There was no public sentiment in favor of it, and not a single newspaper in the whole length and breadth of the land had ever advocated it. Yet, sir, in the absence of all this, and upon his own motion, the Secretary of State enters into a contract to pay the Government of Russia the sum of $7,200,000 in gold for a tract of country—in regard to which he knew little or nothing—that we did not need, that nobody wanted, and as far as known was utterly worthless.
> * * * I make no doubt that both France and Spain abandoned their pretensions to it (Alaska) simply because they regarded the whole country as absolutely valueless. Certain it is that the whole civilized world were content to allow Russia to possess and occupy it. * * * The propriety of its acquisition had never been mooted or discussed anywhere in the country. No newspaper had ever advocated it. No public man had ever publicly advocated it. Nobody demanded it. Nobody wanted it. Nobody had any information in regard to it. Yet, in the absence of all these things, * * * the Secretary of State undertakes to wrench from our tax-ridden people the large sum of $7,200,000 in gold, regardless of their wishes and in wanton disregard of the general welfare.

The hint upon which the honorable Secretary appears to have acted came from the legislature of the Territory of Washington in the shape of a memorial.

MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS IN 1866.

The memorial referred to by Mr. Washburn passed the house of representatives of that Territory January 10, 1866. It showed that an abundance of cod, halibut, and salmon of excellent quality were found along the shores of the Russian possessions, and requested the President to obtain such rights and privileges from the Government of Russia as would enable American fishing vessels to visit the ports and harbors of Alaska to the end that fuel, water, etc., might be easily obtained. Proceeding, the speaker said:

Who gave him (the Secretary of State) the right to squander millions of the money of the people at this time of general financial distress and to complicate us with a foreign power that it was urged, as an excuse why the treaty should be ratified, that we would offend Russia if we did not? * * * The Czar has a minister here who has lived in this capital for twenty years. He speaks our language, and should be by this time somewhat familiar with the workings of our Government. He knew perfectly well, when he was overreaching our Secretary in his land trade, that the Secretary was promising what he had no power to perform without the aid of this House. * * * With an Indian war on our hands that is costing us untold millions, it is proposed to pay $7,200,000 for a country where none but malefactors will ever live and where we are likely to be at constant war with the savages. * * *

After denouncing the treaty as an outrage on the rights of the American people, Mr. Washburn, continuing, said:

Persons well informed as to Alaska are ungrateful enough to hint that we could have bought a much superior elephant in Siam or Bombay for one-hundredth part of the money, with not a ten-thousandth part of the expense incurred in keeping the animal in condition.

GEN. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER'S VIEW.

Discussing the same subject, Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, in the House of Representatives, said:

If we are to pay for her (Russia's) friendship this amount, I desire to give her the $7,200,000 and let her keep Alaska, because I think it may be a small sum to give her for her friendship if we could only get rid of the land, or ice, rather, which we are to get by paying it. * * * I have no doubt that at any time within the last twenty years we could have had Alaska for the asking. I have heard it so stated in the Cabinets of two Presidents, provided we would have taken it as a gift. But no man, except one insane enough to buy the earthquakes in St. Thomas and ice fields in Greenland, could be found to agree to any other terms for its acquisition by this country.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PILES. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Washington from whose speech he is quoting?

Mr. PILES. I am quoting from a speech by Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts.

When the Committee of the House on Foreign Affairs had under consideration in May, 1868, the question of reporting a bill providing for an appropriation to carry out the terms of the treaty, the minority, after disparaging the climate and ridiculing Secretary Seward, reported as follows:

* * * A minority of the committee, having considered the various questions involved and the evidence in regard to this country under consideration, are forced to the conclusion that the possession of the country is of no value to the Government of the United States; that it will be a source of weakness instead of power, and a constant annual expense for which there will be no adequate return; that it has no capacity as an agricultural country; that its timber is mostly confined to a narrow strip of country only 30 miles wide, south of Mount St. Elias, and is generally of a poor quality and growing upon inaccessible mountains; that its fur trade is of insignificant value to us as a nation, and will speedily come to an end; that the fisheries are of doubtful value; and that, whatever the value of its fisheries, its fur trade, its timber, or its minerals, they are all open to the citizens of the United States under existing treaties; that the right to govern a nation or nations of savages in a climate unfit for the habitation of civilized men is not worthy of purchase.

These, Mr. President, are but a few of the many similar utterances which might be cited, but I forbear taking up further time of the Senate in referring to them.

SEWARD'S GREATEST ACHIEVEMENT.

Let us see now, sir, what has become of the contentions of those who opposed the purchase of Alaska, and of the predictions of that statesman who, in favoring its purchase, looked into the future with prophetic vision.

Westward, Mr. President, the course of empire has taken its way, and, as Thomas Jefferson was responsible for the acquisition of Louisiana, so William H. Seward was responsible for the purchase of Alaska. It is said that when that great statesman was nearing the end of his eventful life, in 1872, he was asked what he considered the greatest achievement of his public career of forty years, and he answered: "The annexation of Alaska, but it will take the country a generation to find out Alaska's value."

In 1858, while Mr. Seward was a member of this Senate, in the course of a speech which he then delivered, he gave utterance to this sentiment:

The Pacific Ocean, its shores, its islands, and the vast regions beyond will become the chief theater of events in the world's great hereafter.

In 1860, about three years before the Russian fleet stood in the New York Harbor during our Civil War, and seven years before concluding the purchase of Alaska, while addressing the citizens of St. Paul, Mr. Seward said:

Standing here and looking off into the westward I see the Russian as he busily occupies himself in establishing seaports and fortifications on the verge of this continent as the outposts of St. Petersburg; and I can say, "Go on and build your outposts all along the coast, up even to the Arctic Ocean; they will yet become the outposts of my own country—monuments of the civilization of the United States in the Northwest."

PRODUCTION OF GOLD $107,000,000.

The statements of Mr. Seward, which I have just read, illustrate the farsightedness of that eminent statesman, and prove beyond peradventure that he urged the purchase of Alaska, not for the mere purpose of pleasing Russia or of making her a present in recognition of the friendly disposition which she manifested toward this country in sending her fleet to the Atlantic coast during the civil war, as was charged at the time the treaty was made, but because he foresaw, better than any other man of his time, the real value of Russia's possession in the Pacific Northwest to the American nation.

Alaska, Mr. President, was little known in the world's history or in the world's commerce before the discovery of the placer diggings in the Klondike was made known in 1897. Those who considered it from a distance looked upon it as a barren, frozen waste, incapable of producing anything besides ice and furs. Since that time it has added to the gold wealth of our country more than $107,000,000, and has in no small degree contributed toward making us one of the greatest gold-producing nations of the world; and yet the interior, in which the placer diggings are found, has been barely touched. But gold, extraordinary as the production of it is, and increasing as it must from year to year for at least half a century yet to come, is not the sole wealth of Alaska. It has copper—mountains of it—tin, marble, gypsum, lead, iron, silver, and coal—not only in veins but in extensive ledges of great depth and of the very finest quality—besides its forests and fields of petroleum.

POPULATION AND COMMERCE.

While Alaska at the present time, Mr. President, has a population not exceeding 90,000 souls, about 35,000 of whom are white, the annual commerce between it and the United States proper amounts to approximately $50,000,000.

There are now engaged in commerce between the ports of Puget Sound and Alaska twenty-two ocean-going steamships, where, prior to 1897, there were but three or four. There are also engaged in trade on the upper and lower Yukon and the Tanana rivers seventy-two steamers and fifty-two freight barges; whereas, before the discovery of the Klondike placers, there were no vessels of any character engaged in commerce on any of the interior rivers of Alaska save a few small craft trading with the Indians and hunters along its streams.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA.

Mr. President, when I first visited that Territory in 1883, and looked upon the range of mountains which separates the lakes and the upper Yukon from tide water, I little thought that within a period of seventeen years from that time there would be constructed a line of railway across those mountains; but such, sir, is the fact. The White Pass Railroad is and has been in operation across the mountains from Skagway to White Horse, a distance of 112 miles, since 1900. And as an evidence of the progress that is being made in Alaska, I may say in passing, that there are now several hundred miles of railways under construction in that Territory from various points on the seacoast to the interior. When the roads now under construction and those contemplated shall be completed, and the exposition shall bring prominently into public view the possibilities of that northern region, the population of the territory will be largely increased and its resources speedily developed.

ALASKAN FISHERIES.

The production of the Alaskan fisheries, while in their infancy, amounts annually to from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000, a larger sum of money for one year's yield of fish than this Government paid for the whole Territory. The fisheries of that Territory have produced, since its purchase, more than $150,000,000. It is said that there are no fisheries in the world which can surpass those of Alaska, because its many streams flowing into Bering Sea and the Pacific Ocean are peculiarly salmon streams, due in a large measure to the fact that they are what we call "midwaters" between the Arctic and Tropic regions, being far enough north to be absolutely pure and far enough south to be tempered by the warm North Pacific or Japan current.

Cod fishing is an inviting field of enterprise. More than 25,000 square miles of cod banks are now profitably worked, according to Government reports, and it is claimed that we have something like 125,000 square miles of this character of fishing in connection with the Alaskan coast. With this immense area, plentifully supplied, one can readily imagine what may be expected from the cod banks of Alaska in the near future. While numerous varieties of food fish are found in great abundance in those waters, salmon is essentially the fish of Alaska, and long after the production of gold and other minerals in that Territory shall cease to be one of the world's wonders, its fish, if this industry be properly protected, will be feeding the millions of the earth.

CLIMATE.

The mention of Alaska, Mr. President, to those unfamiliar with its climatic conditions generally brings up visions of snow and ice. That Territory, with the Arctic Ocean on its north and the thermal currents of ocean and air from the Pacific on its south, has probably a greater variety of climates than it has of minerals. I presume there are more warm days in the winter along the southeastern coast of Alaska than there are in this capital city during the same season. While the thermometer in the interior sometimes drops to 60° or 70° below zero, the cold is not as intense there as it is in northern Minnesota or the Dakotas. This is due to the absence of high winds and to the dryness of the atmosphere, in consequence of which there is very little, if any, suffering from cold. The summers in the interior of Alaska are most delightful; they are not excelled anywhere, even in the most favored latitudes. I have had prepared, under the direction of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, a table of comparative temperatures of various cities in the United States proper and points in Alaska, which I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks, as it will give a fair understanding of the climatic conditions of that Territory as compared with those in other parts of the United States.

ALASKA AN AGRICULTURAL COUNTRY.

No State or Territory, Mr. President, can become permanently great without farms and farmers; and Alaska, I am happy to say, is able to furnish homes to the agriculturalists, notwithstanding what was said against her many years ago and what is now thought of her in some sections of the country.

There are, I am told by as high an authority as the Secretary of Agriculture, from 60,000,000 to 100,000,000 acres of agricultural land in that Territory, or more acres of farming land there, taking the latter figures as a proper estimate, than the total land area of New England, New York, and Pennsylvania combined.

The soil in the valleys is exceedingly rich; and that it has been ground up by the glaciers at the heads of the streams on the mountain summits and carried down the sides of the mountains and deposited in the valleys for many ages is evidenced by the fact that miners in search of gold have dug down 50 feet into this glacial silt and still found rich, alluvial soil.

The Tanana Valley, in which the prosperous town of Fairbanks is situated and which has produced within the last seven years from $22,000,000 to $24,000,000 in gold from its frozen soil, has an average breadth of from 30 to 35 miles and a length of from 800 to 900 miles. It is capable of sustaining, I am told by well-informed residents of that valley, a farming population of from 300,000 to 500,000 people. The ground in the valley is frozen to a depth of probably 100 feet, but commences to thaw in March or April and thaws to a sufficient depth to permit of cultivation. Wild cranberries, said to surpass the cultivated berry of New Jersey, grow there in great profusion, as do also wild strawberries, raspberries, huckleberries, and currants. Practically all small fruits and vegetables of the very finest quality grow in this valley, where, say, from 3 to 4 feet below the earth's surface ice and frozen ground are found. This element, however, adds great value to the soil in that it produces subirrigation, without which the valley, for agricultural purposes, would be an arid waste, the rainfall being insufficient to produce crops. Tests have been made, and it has been found that the hardier grains grow and ripen there without difficulty, although I do not claim that it will ever be a great wheat or grain producing country. There are thousands of acres of meadow lands in the valleys of Alaska—in fact, the whole interior is a fine grass and hay region. Even Kentucky blue grass grows in that northern climate in all its grace and peculiar beauty.

The Tanana and Sushitna form practically one great valley. The soil, however, in the latter does not freeze as it does in the former, and it neither has nor finds necessity for subirrigation, because, being close to the coast, it is watered by the vapor condensed by the high range of mountains between it and the Tanana.

The Copper River Valley is an enormous flat country, and was formerly undoubtedly an inland sea which finally broke through the mountains, making the river which drains the valley bearing its name. This valley is about 100 miles square, and it and many others which I might mention are as productive as the Tanana.

NEARLY TWENTY-FOUR HOURS SUNSHINE.

The length of the day in the Tanana and its tributary valleys in the months of May, June and July is practically all of the twenty-four hours, the sun rising at 1:30 o'clock in the morning and setting at about 10:30 at night. In other words, darkness does not penetrate that region in the months I have named, and crops therefore mature very rapidly during the long hours of the hot summer sun.

A distinguished Government official informed me that during the month of June he camped for seven days 10,000 feet up on the side of Mount McKinley, the highest peak in North America, having an altitude of 20,464 feet; that during that time he beheld a sight seldom witnessed by man, that of the sun standing in full view for seven days and nights. That was indeed a rare scene, Mr. President, but only one of the many wonders of that northern land.

TRANSPORTATION REQUIRED FOR DEVELOPMENT.

I do not mean to say, sir, that Alaska now offers opportunities to a large farming population. On the contrary, it does not; but it does offer at the present time opportunities in that respect to the pioneer farmer. Before, however, it can support anything like a large farming population, railroads must tap the great valleys and open up the coal fields, the copper deposits, and the placer diggings, which can not now be worked, owing to the lack of transportation facilities.

GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION A GOOD INVESTMENT.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the contention that this exposition will be of little or no benefit to the Government must be made by those who have not well considered the subject; for will anyone deny that, if the products of Alaska are sufficiently exhibited, and the facts which I have stated amply demonstrated, the population of the Territory will be greatly and speedily increased and its resources more fully and quickly developed? The sum asked is but paltry as compared with the benefits which the Government will receive, not only by the growth in population of the Territory, which means the acquisition of homes by the thousands who need and can not elsewhere find free homes or opportunities to better their condition, but from the much-needed increase in the production of gold, coal, and other Alaskan products which will necessarily follow a further development and an enlarged population.

If the $107,000,000 in gold which Alaska has produced since 1897 should be withdrawn from circulation to-day, we would quickly recognize the importance of that Territory as a great treasure house, and lend all possible assistance toward its reproducing a similar amount at the earliest possible moment. But there are some, sir, who hesitate to aid an enterprise which will, in the nature of things, stimulate the production of gold in that Territory. Of what consequence is a million dollars to this Government as compared with the advantage it will gain from the increase in the production of gold of ten or twenty millions of dollars a year for many years to come in a given section of the country? No one familiar with Alaska, and understanding its gold-producing power, will deny that this exposition will further such increase in production by bringing sharply to the attention of the people the hidden wealth in the placer diggings, the manner in which the gold in these diggings is mined, and the fact that it is that character of mining which may be prosecuted with the pick and shovel, without the expenditure of large sums of money which is necessary in the development of quartz claims.

VAST DEPOSITS OF MERCHANTABLE COAL.

Then, sir, take the question of coal. For many years the Government has been purchasing the higher grades of coal for its vessels and naval stations on the Pacific coast in foreign markets, while millions of tons of the very finest steam coal lie undeveloped in Alaska. At present two fields of coal of large extent are known to exist in that Territory; they have been the subjects of careful examination by the Geological Survey. The Controller Bay field has an area of about 120 square miles.

Professor Martin, of the Geological Survey, in speaking of this coal, said:

* * * In heating power, as well as in the low amount of impurities, it is almost identical with the Pocahontas steam coal of West Virginia, but excels this coal by having a higher proportion of fixed carbon. There is no other coal with which it is likely to come into general competition with which it is to be compared, for it is higher in heating power and in purity than any coal that is mined upon the Pacific coast, either in the United States, in Canada, or Australia.

Coal has been discovered on the Pacific Ocean side of the Alaska Peninsula as far out as Portage Bay, some 200 miles farther west than Honolulu, and within convenient reach of vessels traversing the shortest steamer route from this country to Asia. Portage Bay is said to be a well-protected harbor, and it needs no exaggerated statement to emphasize the value of a coal mine situated 200 miles farther out into the Pacific Ocean than the city of Honolulu as a coaling station for our naval fleet and merchant vessels.

The Government is certainly interested in having the Alaskan coal fields developed, which are underlaid with the character of coal demanded in our naval service. We have important naval stations on the Pacific which require large quantities of coal for their use. We build ships of the highest efficiency at great expense; they require the highest and best grade of fuel that can be obtained for their operation; to give them any less than this is to take away the very efficiency which we have spent millions of dollars in securing in their construction. Testimony given before the Committee on Territories of the Senate, while considering the matter of railroad construction for the development of Alaska, tended to show that the introduction of this and the Matanuska coal (also a field of large area and of high quality) would probably save the Government in the Navy alone a very large sum of money every year.

RESOURCES MUST BE MADE KNOWN.

These vast natural resources will not be developed by the investment of the necessary capital until they become known to the public; and the prime object of having Alaska fairly represented at the exposition is to bring her natural resources to the attention of the people in the most convincing way, so that an interest may be aroused in their early development.

The Government, Mr. President, should in my judgment give its encouragement to any meritorious movement looking toward the advancement of the country and the development of our trade and natural resources. We have, since 1803, added 2,937,613 square miles of contiguous and noncontiguous territory, the greater portion of which lies west of the Mississippi River. For this territory we paid a little more than $87,000,000. The Government has lost nothing by investing in the western country. Statistics show that it has, in the thirty years ending June 30, 1906, received from the sales of public lands west of the Mississippi River more than $140,000,000; and there is yet remaining west of this river public lands of the value of more than $500,000,000, computed at $1.25 per acre.

And the Government will lose nothing by encouraging this exposition, as it will make known the resources of a new and productive land and aid in developing our commerce and in promoting our trade from a practical business standpoint, which will result in substantial benefit to the country at large. As an encouragement to other States and countries in making displays at the exposition; as a means of calling attention to the present importance and future possibilities of the western coast, Alaska, and our possessions in the Pacific, and, finally, as a means of fostering commerce in the Pacific and placing ourselves in close touch with the other countries which participate in that commerce, the Government should make an adequate exhibit which will prove an investment producing manifold returns to the people; and in this the Government is vitally interested. It is expending annually, through the several Departments, large sums of money to promote commerce, agriculture, and the various industries of the country. Participation in this exposition will therefore be a means to the end which the Government is striving to attain through the expenditures of the Departments for the purposes indicated, and will, so far as it goes, produce equal if not better results.

IMPORTANCE OF THE WEST TO THE UNITED STATES.

The exposition will bring together the people and products from Alaska, from the Canadian Yukon, from the west coast of Canada, from the islands of the Pacific, from the Orient, from the west coasts of South and Central America, and the Republic of Mexico. It will introduce, from the participating States and countries, the producers and the consumers, and will lead the people of the eastern, southern and central portions of the United States to understand what the West, constantly becoming a stronger factor in our national life, really is.

No man of this century will deny the wisdom of Mr. Seward's prophecy concerning the future of the Pacific Ocean. The commercial powers, once unmindful of its importance, have invaded it. There is hardly an important European power that does not occupy one or more of its islands, in whole or in part, not for the purpose of benefiting the natives, but for the purpose of promoting its commerce in the most fruitful field on earth today. Our country, with its natural advantages, is, without question, the best equipped of all the nations in the struggle for the commercial mastery of the Pacific. To become predominant, it has only to make use of its superior opportunities for exploitation. The importance of the Pacific Northwest in this struggle can not well be overestimated.

We are told that the commerce of Holland, as early as the sixteenth century, gathered into her harbors the fruits of the wide world. That while she produced practically no grain, she had the best supplied granaries of Europe; without fields of flax, she swarmed with weavers of linen; without flocks, she became the center of all woolen manufactures; and that provinces that had not a forest built more ships than all Europe besides. If Holland, Mr. President, without the material elements which inhere in the greatness of a state, could build such a commerce, what, sir, shall be the future commercial greatness of the Pacific Northwest, with its immense wheat fields, flocks of sheep, and herds of cattle; its forests that can not be approximated elsewhere on the globe; its diversified farm products; its capacious harbors; its numerous water courses teeming with merchantable fish; its inexhaustible fields of coal, iron, and other mineral wealth, to supply an old, yet a new world, lying to its westward inviting its trade?

POPULATION AND COMMERCE OF PACIFIC COUNTRIES.

The statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor show that the countries bordering on the Pacific, exclusive of the United States, have an area of 17,096,060 square miles, and a population of more than 904,000,000 people. The total annual foreign commerce of these countries is now nearly $4,000,000,000, and is growing enormously. The trade of Central and South America on the Pacific side should not be overlooked or neglected by us if we expect to participate in their future development. Their annual importations amount to nearly $600,000,000, while they export during the same period commodities of the value of more than $800,000,000. We can, by proper attention and through the medium of this exposition, lay the foundation for increasing our trade and friendly relations with these rapidly developing countries.

TRADE OF THE UNITED STATES WITH CHINA AND JAPAN.

The growth of our commerce in the Orient has been not only surprising but gratifying under the circumstances. The exports from this country to the Chinese Empire did not amount to $10,000,000 until 1897. In that year, however, the value of our exports was nearly $12,000,000, while in 1902 they jumped to $24,531,118, and in 1905 to $53,301,131.

The history of our trade with Japan is even more striking. The imports of that country in 1892 amounted to but $48,858,000. Of this the United States furnished only $4,102,000; while in 1905 the total imports of Japan amounted to $243,291,932, of which $51,934,691 came from this country; or, in other words, Japan received from us in that year a little more than one-fifth of her total importations.

The showing we have made is not what it should or would be if our trade in the Pacific had been properly fostered, but it foreshadows our future possibilities in the Orient. Statistics show that Great Britain, much farther from the Asiatic markets than we are, has during the last fifteen years furnished 21.78 per cent of the importations of China and Japan, while we have furnished to these countries but 10.71 per cent of their importations during the period mentioned.

That the burden of developing our oriental commerce rests largely with the Pacific coast cities is, I think, generally admitted, and the fostering of this commerce for the future may be greatly influenced by the attitude of the Government toward such agencies as the proposed exposition for its development.

ONE EXPOSITION WEST OF THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS.

In the entire history of the country but one appropriation has been made by the Government for an exposition west of the Rocky Mountains. That was for the Lewis and Clark Centennial Exposition held at Portland, Oreg., in 1905, and for which the Government appropriated only $475,000, while I believe each State on the Pacific slope has contributed liberally to every exposition that has been held in the United States since those States were respectively admitted into the Union. At any rate, they have, with characteristic western spirit, cheerfully borne their share of the nearly $28,000,000 that have been appropriated for other expositions held in different sections of the country.

ALASKA'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE WEALTH OF THE NATION.

Alaska, Mr. President, has contributed her share to the wealth of the nation, and she is entitled to encouragement and recognition at the hands of the Government. She has paid into the Treasury of the United States, in round numbers, $12,000,000 in revenue alone, and her productions of gold, fur, and fish have yielded more than $300,000,000. She will continue that contribution to a much larger degree as the years roll on. She is incapable of raising revenue to enable her to participate in the exposition because, notwithstanding her immense wealth and her capacity to produce, she has no form of government under which she can, by taxation or otherwise, raise a fund for this or any other purpose. She must therefore look to the Government, to which she has so freely given, to aid her in participating in the exposition which will so greatly facilitate her advancement.

SEWARD'S PROPHECY COMES TRUE.

Mr. President, the prophecy of William H. Seward has been fulfilled. We have, after a lapse of a generation, come to know, to some degree at least, the benefit and value of that vast domain which he so wisely purchased in 1867. We know from his public utterances that he foresaw the value of Alaska as far back as 1860, and that he was wise enough and courageous enough to purchase it in 1867, in the face of the fiercest opposition and the loudest denunciations.

The people of the Pacific coast, by reason of their close business relations with that Territory, understand its value; they read its future; they know what it holds in store for the people, and they hope that Congress will aid them in exhibiting its resources on a scale commensurate with its importance, for without Congressional aid Alaska must go unrepresented and the exposition become local instead of international in its scope.

We hope the present Congress will not be as reluctant in taking advantage of opportunities in the Pacific Northwest as were some of our former statesmen when the Oregon question was before the country or when Mr. Seward negotiated the treaty for the purchase of Alaska.

THE "OREGON COUNTRY" SAVED BY THE PIONEERS.

Mr. President, the lines of Whittier—

> I hear the tread of pioneers,
> Of nations yet to be,
> The first low wash of waves where soon
> Shall roll a human sea,

are peculiarly applicable to that other land, formerly known as the "Oregon country," of which I shall now speak briefly, and which, when the pioneers were struggling to settle and to save for the people of this Republic, was as harshly spoken of in some quarters, and as indifferently treated in others, as was the proposed purchase of Russia's former possession in North America.

Senator Dickerson, of New Jersey, in February, 1825, expressed the hope in the Senate that the American and British Governments would give the Oregon country to the Indians. He said that it could never become one of the United States, and that if our laws were extended to it, it would have to be considered as a colony; that it could never be of any pecuniary value to us, but that it might be the means of promoting, in a most signal manner, the cause of humanity by being presented to the Indians.

SENATOR BENTON'S PLAN.

Senator Benton, in March, 1825, though speaking very flatteringly of the western part of the country and strongly advocating its acquisition, took it for granted that the ridge of the Rocky Mountains might be named without offense as a convenient, natural, and everlasting boundary between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. He advocated planting the seed of a new power on the Pacific coast, but said that the new government, when strong enough to take care of itself, should separate from the mother country as the child separates from the parent at the age of maturity.

Senator McDuffie, speaking in the Senate in January, 1843, with respect to establishing military posts in the Pacific Northwest, that the pioneers might have military protection against the attacks of the savage tribes, among other things, said:

* * * Now, it is one of the most uncalculating measures which was ever brought before the Senate. For whose benefit are we bound to pass it? Who are to go there, along the line of military posts and take possession of the only part of the territory fit to occupy—that part lying upon the seacoast, a strip less than 100 miles in width; for, as I have already stated, the rest of the territory consists of mountains almost inaccessible and lowlands which are covered with stone and volcanic remains, where rain never falls, except during the spring; and even on the coast no rain falls from April to October, and for the remainder of the year there is nothing but rain. Why, sir, of what use will this be for agricultural purposes? I would not for that purpose give a pinch of snuff for the whole territory. I wish to God we did not own it. I wish it was an impassable barrier to secure us against the intrusion of others.

PRODUCTS OF FARMS IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

I may be pardoned, Mr. President, if I say in this connection that the State of Washington, which I have the honor to in part represent here, with less than one twenty-sixth of her area seeded, harvested more than 35,000,000 bushels of wheat last year. Her crops of barley and of oats are nowhere surpassed. That portion of Washington which the Senator said was covered with stone and volcanic remains, produced last year, in addition to its generous yield of wheat and other farm products, fruit of the value of $16,000,000.

Farming in the rich valleys of Washington is not confined to fruit growing, for the heavy crops of hay mown from the alfalfa meadows, which yield from three to five crops each season, are almost as valuable as the products of the trees.

I have mentioned, Mr. President, only a few of the agricultural products of but one of the States situated in that country which the Senator said was worthless for agricultural purposes.

That portion of the State bordering upon the seacoast, while favored with many fertile valleys and agricultural fields of large extent, has as its chief product timber. Last year the timber product of the State reached the value of $70,000,000, a sum greatly in excess of the value of the wheat crop of the most favored grain State in the Union.

It is not necessary to call the attention of the Senate to other remarks similar to those of the Senator last quoted, as enough has been submitted to show the esteem in which the country was held at that time by some, and the belief entertained by others, that it was not then and never would be of any material value to the American nation.

DANIEL WEBSTER THOUGHT OREGON A POOR COUNTRY.

I was somewhat surprised in my investigation of this subject to find in what slight estimation even Mr. Webster, as late as 1844, held the Oregon country. In writing to Edward Everett, then minister to England, in January of that year, Mr. Webster said:

* * * I feel a good deal of anxiety about the Oregon business. On one side, portions of the English press, especially The Times, appears to me to be doing great mischief by its abusive and reproachful articles; and, on the other side, there are not a few persons in this country, as you know, quite desirous of finding some excuse for difficulty and trouble with England. I most sincerely hope the two Governments may be able to come to an agreement. From present appearances it is not probable that either House will, at present, recommend to the President to give the necessary notice for the termination of the convention of 1818. I believe Oregon to be a poor country, in no way important to England, except that she happens to have settlements in that region, and of very little consequence to the United States.

I imagine, Mr. President, that if Mr. Webster could have foreseen the value of that region to us as a nation, and what it shall mean to us in the future, he would, instead of minimizing its importance in the language I have just quoted, have thrown the force of his powerful influence on the side of the pioneers in their early struggle; and that, if he were alive to-day, and could now see what a splendid outlet British Columbia affords Great Britain through Canada to the Pacific Ocean and to the vast trade and possibilities beyond, he would realize why England regarded the Oregon country as of importance to her, and would give much to recall his statements.

Continuing, Mr. Webster said:

The ownership of the whole country is very likely to follow the greater settlement and larger amount of population, proceeding hereafter from whichsoever of the two countries. * * *

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. If it will not disturb the Senator I should like to state right here an interesting fact, I think, in connection with the quotation the Senator has made from Mr. Webster, to indicate what slight attention the statesmen of those days paid to that far western country and its development. It is illustrated by the fact that in 1843—that remark, I think, was made by Webster in 1844——

Mr. PILES. Eighteen forty-four.

Mr. FULTON. In 1843 nearly 1,000 American citizens crossed the continent from the Missouri River to the Pacific coast and settled in the Oregon country, and yet it seems that the statesmen of that time had little appreciation of the wonderful attractiveness of that great country.

Mr. PILES. The Senator from Oregon is correct.

NATION'S DEBT TO THE EARLY SETTLERS.

To my mind, Mr. President, our ownership of the Oregon country is due to the courage and patriotic determination displayed by the hardy pioneers who in the early days peopled and held that region.

Although the treaty of October 20, 1818, between Great Britain and the United States for the joint occupancy of the Oregon country (which was continued by special convention in 1827 for an indefinite time, with the stipulation that either power might terminate the arrangement upon twelve months' notice) was made without prejudice to the rights of either power, it must, I think, be apparent to all thoughtful students of our history, that had the American pioneer failed to push his way across the mountains, to found American settlements and establish an American form of government in that country, it would in the end have been so largely peopled by British subjects as to have been entirely lost to us.

Mr. Webster believed, as late as 1844, as I have already shown, that the greater settlement and larger amount of population of either power would determine the title to the country.

BLAINE GIVES CREDIT TO THE PIONEERS.

Mr. Blaine, in his Twenty Years of Congress, in discussing the subject, said:

It is not improbable that if the Oregon question had been allowed to rest for the time under the provisions of the treaty of 1827 the whole country would ultimately have fallen into our hands, and the American flag might to-day be waving over British Columbia. The course of events and the lapse of time were working steadily to our advantage. In 1826 Great Britain declined to accept the forty-ninth parallel, but demanded the Columbia River as the boundary. Twenty years afterwards she accepted the line previously rejected.

Why? He answers the question himself:

American settlers had forced her back.

This statement, Mr. President, is significant when we recall that there were in the Oregon country not to exceed 500 Americans—men, women, and children—in the spring of 1843, while at the time of the settlement of our dispute with Great Britain over that country, in June, 1846, there were between 6,000 and 7,000 of our people in that Territory.

GREAT BRITAIN VALUED THE PACIFIC.

I am not criticising Great Britain, Mr. President, for her attitude. No one can help admiring her aggressive claims. She understood the immense value of a frontage on the Pacific Ocean. She foresaw that the larger that frontage the greater would be her power in the Pacific. She knew, Mr. President, in a general way at least, the value of the empire which the pioneers were saving to the American people. And so did the pioneers themselves, who were out yonder fighting the most important battle of modern times in a peaceful way, without for years having either governmental protection or encouragement, and without knowing to which flag they might ultimately owe allegiance. Understanding, however, the importance of that region to the American nation, the pioneers were determined to do all in their power to hold the country, that this Republic might have not only a foothold upon the shores of the Pacific, but that it might become the dominant power in the greatest of oceans, and that thousands of patriotic American citizens might there find free homes under the shelter of their own flag.

FIRST AMERICAN GOVERNMENT WEST OF THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS.

In furtherance of this determination, we are told that in February, 1843, a meeting, which is historically known as the "wolf meeting," was held in the Willamette Valley for the purpose of taking action to protect the settlers against the ravages of wolves and other wild beasts. At this gathering, the historian tells us, a committee was appointed to call a general meeting, which took place in March, and at which bounties were offered out of a fund to be raised by volunteer subscription of the settlers. This meeting was in fact called for the purpose of initiating a movement in behalf of a Provisional Government, but its object was carefully veiled under the pretext of a second "wolf meeting," because the American settlers feared that if their design were made known the Hudson Bay Company people might frustrate their plans. After the ostensible business of the meeting had been concluded, those present were addressed by W. H. Gray, a then prominent, weather-beaten, old pioneer, upon the real purpose of the meeting. The address, it is said, concluded as follows:

We have mutually and unitedly agreed to defend and protect our cattle and domestic animals. Now, fellow citizens, I submit and move the adoption of the two following resolutions, that we may have protection for our persons and lives, as well as our cattle and herds:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the propriety of taking measures for the civil and military protection of this colony.

"Resolved, That the said committee consist of twelve persons."

THE STRUGGLE FOR SUPREMACY IN 1843.

The resolutions, Mr. President, were, according to the historian, unanimously adopted and the committee appointed. A meeting was called for the 2d day of May, 1843, to organize a Provisional Government, which, it is said, both the British and the Americans then in the country attended in full force; for here, sir, commenced the real struggle for supremacy.

Looking back now, Mr. President, into a period of a little more than sixty-four years, and upon that now rich and populous section of our country in which that meeting was held, do you recall, sir—does the country recall—how many Americans, after every effort had been made to induce the citizens and subjects of each power to attend, voted at that meeting to establish, in that then distant land, an American form of Government, and out of which land the aggressive and progressive States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, and the western and southwestern parts of Montana and the northwestern corner of Wyoming have been carved?

I wish, Mr. President, that that pioneer voting scene in the wilderness might be transferred to canvas by an artist who could catch the inspiration of the moment and comprehend the importance of the result, which showed that 52 Americans had cast their votes in favor of a provisional government, against the 50 votes of those who opposed them.

WHO'S FOR A DIVIDE?

That election, Mr. President, was not conducted in the form of elections of the present day. The opposing forces met under the great trees in a partly cleared field, near a small log house. After discussion of the report of the committee favoring the organization of a provisional government, owing to considerable confusion difficulty was experienced in determining the vote of the intermingled forces. In the midst of this confusion a division was suggested. Acting upon the suggestion, a picturesque mountaineer, of heroic stature and unfailing courage, by the name of Joe Meek, a Virginian by birth, rose and said: "Who's for a divide? All in favor of the report and of an organization follow me." Fifty-one followed Joe Meek, and 49 the opposing leader; and so, by a majority of two votes, the Americans won the day. But the forces were too evenly divided for the majority to put immediately into successful operation their form of government. In the fall and winter of 1843, however, that historic train of pioneers reached the Oregon country, proving the correctness of Whitman's statement that there was a passageway for wagons across the Rocky Mountains from the Atlantic to the Pacific. From the time of the arrival of that immigrant train, with its eight hundred or a thousand settlers, American supremacy prevailed throughout that portion of the country lying south of the Columbia River.

AMERICAN SETTLEMENT ON PUGET SOUND.

The Hudson Bay Company people had for many years attempted to confine the American settlers to the region south of this river, in order to hold for Great Britain that part of the country north of the Columbia. The Americans were not, however, content to be confined within such narrow limits, or to relinquish without a struggle our claim to that portion of the disputed territory lying to the northward. Actuated by the spirit that induced them to brave the perils of a journey across the continent in the first instance, they steadily extended their settlements into the Puget Sound basin, saving to this country that great and beautiful inland sea known as Puget Sound, upon the shores of which the commerce of the Orient and Occident meet and break bulk, and where, within less than two generations, will stand the third great city of the American continent.

500 AMERICANS IN 1843—2,000,000 IN 1908.

Mr. President, the progress that has been made in that country since those votes were counted reads like a romance. Could de Toqueville, who at one time predicted that the Rocky Mountains would be the probable limit of the American Union, rise from his grave and look upon that imperial land lying yonder west of that lofty range, he would stand as one before whose vision a great mystery had been suddenly revealed. For he would see, Mr. President, more than 2,000,000 happy, peaceful, and prosperous people in that land where, in May, 1843, not more than 500 Americans lived. He would see commerce of the value of hundreds of millions of dollars now annually transacted where—stop, sir, to think of it—within the brief space of a human lifetime there was no commerce at all. He would see, Mr. President, hundreds of thousands of homes, tended by the deft hands of American mothers, where but a few years ago, as time now runs, two missionary brides, the first white women to cross the continent and settle in the Oregon country, stood upon the crest of the mountains and looked down upon the broad, sweeping, yet silent valleys in which they were to found—in which they did, in fact, found—the first American homes. He would look, Mr. President, upon a land which has made us the dominant power in the Pacific Ocean, and without which the British Empire, instead of the American Republic, would hold the key to the commercial supremacy of that ocean.

WESTERN ENTERPRISE DESERVES ENCOURAGEMENT.

Should not that region, Mr. President, which has contributed so much to the material wealth and happiness of our people, be encouraged by Congress in the great enterprise which it has undertaken?

The State of California, in the face of the practical destruction by fire of her greatest city, did not hesitate, as sorely afflicted as she was, to appropriate the sum of $100,000 for the purpose of participating in the exposition. If California, Mr. President, could stop long enough in the rebuilding of San Francisco and of the ruined homes of her people to note sufficiently the value of the exposition to appropriate the sum named, at a time when she needed money as she had never needed it before, it seems to me that Congress ought to appreciate its importance and provide for liberal participation.

FOOTHOLD OF THE UNITED STATES ON THE PACIFIC.

Mr. President, we do not know, we can not estimate, what we owe the pioneers who saved that western land. While the Oregon country was being belittled in different sections of the Union they were out yonder on the plains and in the forests fighting the battle which was to make, which has already made, ours the greatest nation of the earth—for without the Pacific coast region who, sir, would be bold enough to say that as a nation we would occupy our present position or could ever attain it? Who would say that, had we lost that country in 1846, or at any time prior thereto, we would or could have acquired California in 1848 or Alaska in 1867? Who can say, sir, that had we lost the Oregon country we would to-day have even a foothold upon the Pacific coast? What an unfortunate condition, Mr. President, would be ours with another nation just across the Rocky Mountains occupying the entire Pacific coast line! And that another nation is not there, sir, is due to the courage and fortitude of the American pioneer.

"WESTWARD THE COURSE OF EMPIRE TAKES ITS WAY."

Mr. President, there is in the other wing of this Capitol a great and historic mural painting before which the western man stands in mute admiration. It portrays a scene that lives now only in memory and in history. It is a scene, sir, that is never again to be enacted upon this or any other continent. It is the story, Mr. President, of the pioneers, with their wives and children, crossing the mountains to found a new empire upon the shores of what we call the western sea, and in the fertile valleys that lie between the Rocky Mountains and that sea, which the artist has there painted. Go, sir, and look upon it! Aye, let those who come as pilgrims to this Capitol pause before it long enough to grasp its full meaning; for in marking, as it does, a sublime epoch in the history of our country it reveals an incident in our national life that can be seen now only through the medium of art. The imperial West is settled. The day of heroic pioneering is ended. That land which was once far off and beyond the most distant horizon is now belted with steel. The valleys that were once as quiet as was the ruined city of Palmyra when Count Volney mused upon it are now teeming with life and bursting with activity. Those vast plains—the Great American Desert—once thought to be fruitless, have answered to the touch of the plow and fulfilled the hopes of man. Farther on, upon the shores of the placid sea, stately cities with a mighty commerce have raised their spires and set their spindles among the upheaved mountains of a far-away age. And we have builded there, Mr. President, schools and churches and factories and a civilization unsurpassed in the most enlightened sections of this or any other land.

ALL DUE TO THE PIONEER.

And, sir, who peopled that region and founded those cities? It was the pioneer and his children, who fought, with a desperation surpassing the heroic, the most effective battle of all—the battle of the supremacy of the white man over the aborigines and the elements, coupled with isolation and want, that that immense stretch of country might not fall into alien hands. That they prevailed, sir, history records.

But, Mr. President, had the pioneers been as timorous or as indifferent as were some of the statesmen of their age, their efforts would have been but "a twice-told tale," remembered only as are "the footprints of the traveler over the sand;" and that land, formerly known as the "Oregon country," instead of being, as it now is, the common heritage of all our people, would be to-day one of the possessions of the British Empire.

It is therefore fitting, in view of their achievements, that Congress should aid the people of the Pacific Northwest in their desire to exhibit to an astonished world the progress that in so brief a space of time and under such trying and difficult conditions has been made in the arts, in science, in commerce, in agriculture, in mining, and in manufacturing, and in all, sir, that goes to make a great and glorious land.

SUBPORT OF KNIGHTS KEY, FLORIDA.

Mr. FRYE. The bill (H. R. 14011) amending an act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," was laid before the Senate to-day and referred to the Committee on Commerce. The Senate has already passed and sent to the House a bill of like purport. I ask that the House bill may be put upon its passage, and then I shall ask that the House be requested to return the Senate bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to extend the privileges of the first section of the act approved June 10, 1880, to the subport of Knights Key, in the customs collection district of Key West, Fla.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FRYE, it was Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3344) extending to the subport of Knights Key, in the State of Florida, the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement.

SNAKE RIVER DAM, WASHINGTON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order. The Secretary will report the first bill.

The bill (H. R. 7618) to authorize the Benton Water Company, its successors, or assigns to construct a dam across the Snake River, in the State of Washington, was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] is somewhat interested in this bill. I do not see him present. I ask that it may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, without prejudice.

GOVERNMENT DEPOSITARIES.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolution submitted by Mr. STONE January 23, 1908, authorizing and directing the Committee on Finance to make inquiry and report as to the distribution of moneys of the United States by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. KEAN. I suggested the other day that this resolution might be indefinitely postponed. I do not see that the Senator from Missouri can have any objection to having it indefinitely postponed at the present time.

Mr. STONE. I think it had better be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to that reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance, in the absence of objection.

EXTENSION OF BOUNTY-LAND LAWS.

The bill (S. 1407) to extend the provisions of the existing bounty-land laws to the officers and enlisted men, and the officers and men of the boat companies of the Florida Seminole Indian war was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

MINING TECHNOLOGY BRANCH.

The joint resolution (S. R. 35) to provide for a mining technology branch in the Geological Survey, was announced as the next business on the Calendar.

Mr. KEAN. Let the resolution go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

JOHN H. HAMITER.

The bill (S. 4024) for the relief of John H. Hamiter was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to John H. Hamiter, of Lafayette County, Ark., $3,590.47, the proceeds of the sale of fifty-three bales of cotton sold by the Government in 1865 and placed in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KEAN. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. DAVIS, January 28, 1908, from the Committee on Claims.

REVISION OF THE PENAL LAWS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. It has been thought advisable that a reprint be made of the sections that were passed over for further consideration and for an elaboration of the notes to accompany them. The notes have been elaborated in conformity with suggestions and expressions during the consideration of those sections. The reprint is not yet out of the Printer's hands. I therefore ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection it is so ordered.

JOHN H. HAMITER.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey? The Chair hears none, and the consideration of Senate bill 4024 will be resumed.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4024) for the relief of John H. Hamiter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the report will be resumed.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report submitted by Mr. DAVIS January 28, 1908, which is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4024) for the relief of John H. Hamiter, having considered the same, recommend that the said bill be passed.

The bill provides for the payment to John H. Hamiter the sum of $3,590.47, the proceeds of the sale of 53 bales of cotton sold in 1865, the net proceeds being placed in the Treasury of the United States.

The chairman of the Committee on Claims referred this bill to the Secretary of the Treasury for a report, which report is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 2, 1906.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th ultimo, inclosing Senate bill 3283, "For the relief of John H. Hamiter."

The bill proposes to appropriate $3,590.47, the proceeds of 53 bales of cotton sold by the Government in 1865 and placed in the Treasury of the United States.

You request report on the bill.

In reply, I have the honor to report that 53 bales of cotton were collected from John H. Hamiter, in Lafayette County, Ark., in October 1865, shipped to New York, and sold. The net proceeds of the 53 bales were $3,590.47, which amount was placed in the Treasury.

Respectfully,

L. M. SHAW, Secretary.

Hon. C. W. FULTON,
Chairman Committee on Claims, United States Senate.

The affidavit of Mr. Hamiter shows the circumstances of the taking of this cotton and also that under the President's amnesty proclamation of May 29, 1865, that Mr. Hamiter had taken the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States prior to the seizure of the cotton in question.

This cotton was not "captured." The Supreme Court of the United States, in Ninth Wallace, page 540, in the case of the United States v. Padelford, clearly defined the meaning of the word "captured," as follows:

"As early as the 3d of July, 1863, the Secretary of the Treasury, in a circular letter of instructions addressed to the supervising special agents of the Department, charged with the duty of collecting abandoned and captured property under the act of March 12, 1863, defined captured property as property 'which had been seized or taken from hostile possession by the military and naval forces of the United States.' This definition must be taken as the interpretation practically given to the act by the Department of the Government charged with its execution; and we think it correct."

This cotton was not taken from "hostile" possession, but, on the contrary, was taken from the possession of an individual who had been pardoned by the President's proclamation, and his taking the oath under it fully restored him to all his property rights.

It was not "abandoned" at any time, but was in the personal possession of Hamiter and within the inclosure around his residence.

At the time of the seizure Mr. Hamiter was temporarily absent on a visit to relatives in Louisiana, but his residence and property was under the personal charge of Isaac Shepherd, who forbade the taking of the cotton. It appears that Mr. Fuqua, the agent who seized the cotton, had been the personal guest of Mr. Hamiter for a night only a short time previous to the seizure.

This cotton had been removed from Mr. Hamiter's plantation to his residence; it had never been sold, and was never claimed by anybody up to the time of the seizure by Fuqua. There were about 180 bales of cotton taken, although the proceeds of the sale of only 53 bales, amounting to $3,590.47 net, seems to have found its way into the Treasury.

In the case above referred to, of The United States v. Padelford, on page 542, Ninth Wallace, the property in question had been actually captured in time of war and in the midst of military operations, but after the claimant had under an amnesty proclamation of the President taken the oath of allegiance, the court, in a unanimous opinion, used the following language:

"In the case of Garland, this court held the effect of a pardon to be such 'that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense;' and in the case of Armstrong's foundry, we held that the general pardon granted to him relieved him from a penalty which he had incurred to the United States. It follows that at the time of the seizure of the petitioner's property he was purged of whatever offense against the laws of the United States he had committed by the acts mentioned in the findings, and relieved from any penalty which he might have incurred. It follows, further, that if the property had been seized before the oath was taken, the faith of the Government was pledged to its restoration upon the taking of the oath in good faith. We can not doubt that the petitioner's right to the property in question, at the time of the seizure, was perfect, and that it remains perfect notwithstanding the seizure."

In the same case, on page 543, the court further says:

"Under the proclamation and the act, the Government is a trustee, holding the proceeds of the petitioner's property for his benefit, and having been fully reimbursed for all expenses incurred in that character, loses nothing by the judgment, which simply awards to the petitioner what is his own."

The case in which the court in a unanimous opinion made these declarations was in all respects parallel to this case, except that in the Padelford case the property was actually captured in the city of Savannah by the Federal Army when the capture of that city was made on December 21, 1864, by the forces of the United States.

In the case of Kline v. The United States (13 Wallace, p. 137) the court held that, while all private property belonging to disloyal persons South was liable to confiscation, nevertheless—

"No titles were divested in the insurgent States unless in pursuance of a judgment rendered after due legal proceedings. The Government recognized to the fullest extent the humane maxims of the modern law of nations, which exempt private property of noncombatant enemies from capture as booty of war. Even the law of confiscation was sparingly applied."

And on page 142 in the same case—

"We conclude, therefore, that the title to the proceeds of the property which came to the possession of the Government by capture or abandonment, with the exceptions already noticed, was in no case divested out of the original owner. It was for the Government itself to determine whether these proceeds should be restored to the owner or not. The promise of the restoration of all rights of property decides that question affirmatively as to all persons who availed themselves of the proffered pardon. It was competent for the President to annex to his offer of pardon any conditions or qualifications he should see fit; but after those conditions and qualifications had been satisfied, the pardon and its connected promises took full effect. The restoration of the proceeds became the absolute right of the persons pardoned on application within two years from the close of the war. It was, in fact, promised for an equivalent. 'Pardon and restoration of political rights' were 'in return' for the oath and its fulfillment. To refuse it would be a breach of faith not 'less cruel and astounding' than to abandon the freed people whom the Executive had promised to maintain their freedom."

Judge Miller, who will always be remembered as a great and able judge, dissented from this opinion of the court, and in his dissenting opinion, in which Mr. Justice Bradley concurred, he said:

"But I have not been able to bring my mind to concur in the proposition that under the act concerning captured and abandoned property there remains in the former owner, who had given aid and comfort to the rebellion, any interest whatever in the property or its proceeds when it had been sold and paid into the Treasury or had been converted to the use of the public under that act."

Further on in the same dissenting opinion, Judge Miller, in commenting on the Padelford case, in which case he had concurred with all the judges, said:

"In that case the opinion makes a labored and successful effort to show that Padelford, the owner of the property, had secured the benefit of the amnesty proclamation before the property was seized under the same statute we are now considering. And it bases the right of Padelford to recover its proceeds in the Treasury on the fact that before the capture his status as a loyal citizen had been restored, and with it all his rights of property, although he had previously given aid and comfort to the rebellion. In this view I concurred with all my brethren. And I hold now that as long as the possession or title of property remains in the party, the pardon or the amnesty remits all right in the Government to forfeit or confiscate it. (The italics are Justice Miller's.)"

Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that the court was in error in its conclusions in the Kline cases, and that Justice Miller was right, it will be seen that the present case comes strictly within the rule suggested by him. Thus we have the unanimous opinion of all the judges in both the Padelford case and the Kline case that, under circumstances such as exist in this case, "all right in the Government to forfeit or confiscate" the property had been remitted, and that under the proclamation of the President and the action of petitioner in taking and faithfully keeping his oath of allegiance, "the Government is a trustee holding the proceeds of petitioner's property for his benefit; and having been fully reimbursed for all expenses incurred in that character the Government loses nothing by the return of the money which 'simply awards to the petitioner what is his own.'"

Under the circumstances of this case and the law as distinctly laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States it seems clear to the committee that the net proceeds of this fifty-three bales of cotton should be restored to the owner of the cotton, and we therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] if this bill was considered by the commission that was appointed soon after the close of the civil war.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have no information that it was. It has been considered by the Committee on Claims of this body twice. It was investigated at the last session, and a report substantially similar to the one which has been read at the desk was made. The bill was considered by the Senate and passed, but it failed to pass the other House.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator will remember that soon after the close of the civil war Congress took up the subject of providing payment for the claims of all parties who were entitled to payment under the law, and a commission was appointed to consider all such claims. An immense amount of testimony was taken by the commission, and an opportunity given to every person in any of the States that were lately in rebellion to present their claims to the commission, and if they were entitled under the law of the land to any recognition whatever those claims were allowed.

I had occasion while a Member of the other House to look into this matter a good deal, and, without desiring to interfere unnecessarily with the Senator from Arkansas, I should like to have the bill go over until I can look into the report made by that commission.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, why not permit me to make some statement about it just now? That may obviate the necessity of making an examination into the old report.

Mr. HOPKINS. The commission at that time investigated the claim of every loyal citizen in the Southern States and made their report. The report of that commission has been the guide of Congress for more than thirty years.

If this claim was there presented and was allowed, certainly there could be no objection to it. If it was disallowed by the commission, there ought to be some strong reasons shown to the Senate, as it seems to me, why we at this late date should consider it. If it was not considered at all by the commission, then it seems to me there ought to be a full and complete explanation showing why this party did not take advantage of the commission that was investigating all this class of claims.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I insist that there exists a reason that will take this claim out of the class that the commission was created to consider. This cotton was not planted until after the civil war ceased. The cotton was planted later than April, 1865, and was taken from this claimant the latter art of October, 1865—after the war had ceased. It is not strictly a war claim at all.

More than a hundred bales of cotton were taken, and the proceeds of fifty-three of the bales were placed in the Treasury, and are there now. The claimant is not making a claim against the United States Government for anything except for the restitution of the proceeds of his own property, taken at a time when active hostilities were not in progress in that part of the country or anywhere else.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas why it was that this claimant did not present his demand against the Government?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is a matter I can hardly explain any further than that he did not do it. It was not in the class, and it was not necessary to present the claim to that particular tribunal, because it probably had no jurisdiction over it.

Mr. TELLER. It did not have.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It did not have jurisdiction of a question of that kind. The question as to why the particular claimant did not press his claim may probably be explained by some of the attorneys who had charge of it, but the justice of the claim is very manifest from the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOPKINS. When was this claim first presented to Congress?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I presented it at the last session.

Mr. HOPKINS. Was that the first time it was ever presented?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It was the first I know anything about its pendency here.

Mr. HOPKINS. Can the Senator explain to this body or to the House of Representatives why this claim has been permitted to sleep for more than thirty years before it is presented against the Government?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I can not, except that the claimant himself is a farmer with limited information about matters of that kind. Possibly he did not understand that he had a claim against the Government.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is the original claimant living?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. He is living still. He is an old man now, and is very much in need of the proceeds of the property wrongfully taken from him forty years ago.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is the claim presented by him or by some other person?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is presented by him. There is no assignee.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the attorneys get any commission on the payment if Congress shall favorably consider it?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I can not say about that. Ex-Senator Jones, my predecessor here, is his attorney. I presume he has some contract with him. I am not sure about that. He is an old friend of ex-Senator Jones and an old friend of ours. He is a very reputable citizen of the State of Arkansas.

Mr. HOPKINS. Ex-Senator Jones, as I remember, was a Senator from Arkansas for a great many years after the close of the civil war, and as a Senator he never felt that this claim had such merit in it as he was willing to stand sponsor for as a public officer. Is that correct?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have no information that he knew anything about its existence. I am sure he did not think it was an unmeritorious claim, because it is not, and manifestly it is not. If he thought anything on the subject he did not think that. He probably knew nothing about it.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire, Mr. President, to call to the attention of Senators the fact that under the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas forty-three years have elepsed since the close of the civil war, and the gentleman who is now acting as an attorney served in this body for many years—I think for eighteen or twenty years—and during all that period he never felt, as a public officer, that there was merit enough in the claim to present it to this body.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think the Senator from Illinois does the ex-Senator from the State of Arkansas injustice when he says he never thought there was sufficient merit in the claim to justify him in presenting it. I have no information that he knew anything about the existence of the claim. If the Senator from Illinois has such information, I am sure he is justified in making that statement. He would not be justified in making it unless he was advised.

Mr. HOPKINS. I simply judge from the conditions as they appear here this morning. As I said, I have had occasion in years gone by to look into these claims very closely, while a Member of the other branch of Congress, and I have found that lapse of time has aided many of these claimants to get claims before the Senate and the House that, had they been taken up at the proper time, when the Government could have been protected by evidence which was then in existence, never would have been favorably considered. Of course, I make the suggestion to call the attention of Senators to that condition. If this is a claim of real merit, it should be made manifest before it is considered favorably by the Senate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think it perfectly manifest from a consideration of the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury that this is just the kind of a case that the Senator says should exist in order to justify action at this late date. There has been a favorable report of two committees of the Senate.

It appears that in October, 1865, a large number of bales of cotton, largely in excess of the number now sought to be recovered for, were taken from John H. Hamiter, now a citizen of Arkansas; that a part of the cotton taken from him was sold, and the proceeds of fifty-three bales paid into the Treasury. It is there to-day.

It was not a war claim, because the war had ceased. It may possibly be that the officer who took the cotton assumed that he had some authority growing out of his connection with the Army, but the United States Government has no title, legal or equitable, to this money, and no officer of the Government asserts that it has.

It is a perfectly evident proposition that the whole thing was an erroneous exercise of authority, if not a wrongful one. The only question to be determined now is whether or not there is an equitable, just, and moral claim rightly asserted on behalf of the owner of that cotton for the money. The United States Government asserts no claim to it. There is no pretense that there is the slightest foundation or that there can be the slightest ground for assuming that the United States Government had any title to it then or has any title to it now. The equity of the claim becomes perfectly obvious upon a mere statement of the circumstances under which the cotton was taken from Mr. Hamiter.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the Senator if, under existing law, the claimant could not go into the Court of Claims and make good his claim there?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Court of Claims could find nothing except what the Secretary of the Treasury admits now.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is that court open to him now?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No, sir; it would not be without some action of Congress. But why send it to the Court of Claims to determine that the cotton was taken in October, 1865? The records of the Treasury Department show that. Why refer it to the Court of Claims to determine the loyalty of the claimant when the record shows that? The money is there in the Treasury to-day opposite an entry upon the books of the Treasury Department, showing whence the money came and to whom it belonged, and the Court of Claims, if it had jurisdiction, could do nothing more.

Mr. HOPKINS. Where is the record of the loyalty of the claimant?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The record of his loyalty, as shown by the report, consists in the fact that he was pardoned by Andrew Johnson and took the oath of allegiance some months before the cotton was taken from him. The cotton was actually planted after the war ceased. This is not cotton that had an existence during the war. It was a crop of cotton raised after the war had ceased in that country. This is a clear case of error, and whilst I am entirely satisfied to see the Senator from Illinois and every other Senator protect the public funds of the United States, I do think, where it is manifest that wrong has been perpetrated and nobody asserts to the contrary, that it will not do to assume that the claim is fraudulent because it is old. There may be many reasons that Mr. Hamiter could give as to why he had not preferred his claim heretofore. I am not familiar with them. I know him, and I know he is a straightforward, honest man, a man somewhat unaccustomed to the ways of the world, and somewhat unaccustomed to the method of collecting claims. It may be that he did not believe he had any claim, and did not suppose he had any right until somebody brought the matter to his attention.

Mr. CULLOM. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which has been referred to, be inserted in the RECORD with the debate on the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will make it a part of my remarks. It is a letter of Secretary Shaw, and I will read it. It is as follows:

Treasury Department, Office of the Secretary, Washington, February 2, 1906——

Mr. KEAN. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that all that went in when the report was read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is already in.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOCATION OF MINERAL CLAIMS.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, on the last legislative day, at the suggestion of the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], Senate bill No. 129 went to the Calendar under Rule IX until that Senator could examine it. He has now withdrawn any objection, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be restored to its place under Rule VIII, and that it be now considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 129, the title of which will be stated, be transferred from the Calendar under Rule IX to Rule VIII.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 129) to validate the location of mineral claims heretofore made by United States deputy mineral surveyors during their incumbency in office.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the bill, the title of which has just been stated, be transferred from the Calendar under Rule IX to Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I now ask that it may be considered in its order.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been heretofore read, and the amendment reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I rise to make an inquiry. I simply desire to ascertain what the bill is, and how it came to be under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the bill is Order of Business No. 138 on the Calendar, being Senate bill 129.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will make a statement which I think will make it plain to the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, when the Calendar was reached on the last legislative day Senate bill 129 was reached in regular order. The bill was read and amended and was about to be put upon its passage when the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] suggested that he desired to make some inquiries regarding the bill, that he did not then have time to examine it, and he asked that it go to the Calendar under Rule IX in order that he might have time for that purpose. This morning the Senator from Kansas advised me that he desired to withdraw his objection to the bill, stating that it might be restored to its former place on the Calendar, and that it might be proceeded with regularly before the Senate. It is now in order, because by the transfer it has become the next bill to be reached.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am willing that the order of transfer should be made, but before the bill is taken up for consideration, or when it is taken up, I should like to have the Senator explain——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been restored to its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII, and is now in order. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 129), to validate the location of mineral claims heretofore made by United States deputy mineral surveyors during their incumbency in office, as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the title to mining claims heretofore located by persons holding commissions as United States deputy mineral surveyors shall not be held invalid by reason of the fact that such locations were made by deputy mineral surveyors during their incumbency in such office and such location shall not be deemed to be in violation of section 452 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Idaho explain what section 452 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides?

Mr. HEYBURN. That provision of the statutes reads as follows:

SEC. 452. The officers, clerks, and employees in the General Land Office are prohibited from directly or indirectly purchasing or becoming interested in the purchase of any of the public land; and any person who violates this section shall forthwith be removed from his office.

Mr. President, that presents several phases of the question that have entered into the consideration of the right of this class of officers to locate mining claims. In the first place, there is a difference of opinion in the Department itself as to whether or not deputy mineral surveyors are in that class of officers against which this prohibition is made. A deputy United States mineral surveyor, under no circumstances which I can recall, receives any pay or consideration from the Government, nor is he on any pay roll. He is merely an officer having certain qualifications, who is designated as a proper person with whom a private individual may make a contract to perform private services paid for by the individual; but under some circumstances, or in some cases, this officer has been held to be within this prohibition, and in others he is held not to be within this prohibition. It will be observed that the statute does not say that a location made by such an officer then and thus described in the act is void or that the effect of his making such a location in any way affects its validity. But in some cases the Department has held that a location made by a deputy mineral surveyor is void; in some cases the courts have held such to be the case; in other cases other courts have held that he is not within the prohibition, and in other cases other courts have held that, even if he were within the prohibition, it would not affect the validity of the location. During all this period of uncertainty, and in the absence of any knowledge on the part of the deputy surveyors that such a question was being raised against them, locations have been made by deputy mineral surveyors, and before they attained any value or were developed as mines, passed, in the ordinary course of transfer, into the hands of innocent purchasers. In due course of time, sometimes within a short period and sometimes after many, many years, claims based upon locations made by deputy mineral surveyors have become mines of very considerable importance. So far as I know, there is no existing controversy depending upon this question, but there is, because of the fact that the Department has held that these officers are within the prohibition of the statute, a feeling of unrest and uncertainty as to the titles to mines that rest upon such locations. I think, however, and so far as I know without any exception, it is the desire of those engaged in mining and owning mineral claims that this question shall be set at rest forever. This is in the nature of a statute to set at rest the questions and uncertainties as to those titles and to remove all temptation from those who would seek to take advantage of this technical or possible construction to be placed upon this statute and provoke litigation for the purpose of forcing compromises.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am familiar with the character of the people who have been making these locations. It is an extreme stretch of imagination on the part of those who call these men officers of the Department. They are not now and never have been employees of the Department in a proper sense. They are not paid by the Department; they are paid entirely by private persons, and they can in no wise be called employees of the Department.

I do not intend to interfere with this bill, for undoubtedly it seeks to correct a bad ruling by the Department. I only want to say that, as a rule, any attempt on our part to validate what is invalid is a pretty dangerous business, and it is only when there is a very clear case of error that we ought to do it. I do not, however, object to the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when this bill was up for consideration on a former occasion, I called attention to its peculiar wording, and I should now like the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] to explain why the words "deputy mineral surveyors" are repeated. The bill reads:

That the title to mining claims heretofore located by persons holding commissions as United States deputy mineral surveyors shall not be held invalid by reason of the fact that such locations were made by deputy mineral surveyors during their incumbency in office as deputy mineral surveyors, etc.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the bill has already been amended by striking out the repetition of the words which was, I suppose, either an error of the printer or of those who corrected the proof. The words "as deputy mineral surveyors" in line 7 have been stricken out, and the word "such" has been interposed between the words "in" and "office" in that line.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is entirely satisfactory to me. I was not aware that the bill had been so amended.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it was done on the last legislative day when this bill was up.

Mr. KEAN. The bill has not been amended or passed.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, and the bill is still in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was not present when that was done.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to make a little statement, so that the record may appear as it should, and it is called forth by the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. I do not know whether the Senator from Colorado has read the report accompanying this bill, but in the report the conflicting decisions are set forth and referred to specifically, and it is held, as I suggested, that these parties were within the prohibited class.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the Supreme Court of the United States in a decision on the 13th of last month held that a land-office inspector, one sent around the country to investigate homestead claims, under this very statute would be incompetent to enter a homestead, and they held his title invalid. The Department has ruled both ways on this subject; but finally the case came to the Supreme Court of the United States, and they held in that decision practically that the statute covered every employee of the Land Office. It is the case of Presser v. Finn, in error to the supreme court of the State of Washington.

Mr. HEYBURN. That case was called to my attention. It relates to an entirely different class of officers—to people on the pay rolls of the Government.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT NIOBRARA MILITARY RESERVATION, NEBR.

The bill (S. 1931) to grant certain land part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, Nebr., to the village of Valentine for a site for a reservoir or tank to hold water to supply the public of said village, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to grant to the village of Valentine, a duly incorporated municipality under the statutes of the State of Nebraska, the northwest quarter and the north half of the southwest quarter of section 30, township 34 north, range 27 west, sixth principal meridian, in the State of Nebraska, that being now a part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, the property of the United States but the tract shall be used by the village in supplying water to its inhabitants, and not for other purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TALTON T. DAVIS.

The bill (S. 2876) to correct the military record of Talton T. Davis was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to correct the military record of Talton T. Davis, of Marion, Kans., late of Company H, Twenty-first Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and to grant him an honorable discharge as of date October 8, 1862; but no pay, bounty, or allowances shall be allowed by reason of this act.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, is there a report accompanying that bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report accompanying the bill submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN.]

Mr. BACON. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS TO SURVIVORS OF CERTAIN INDIAN WARS.

The bill (S. 522) to extend the provisions of the act of June 27, 1902, entitled "An act to extend the provisions, limitations, and benefits of an act entitled 'An act granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war,' approved July 27, 1892," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to extend the provisions of the act of July 27, 1892, as amended by the act of June 27, 1902, to include the Indian wars which occurred in the Territory of Utah down to and including those which took place in the year 1867; but before the name of any person shall be placed on the pension roll under this act proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, shall prescribe, that the applicant is entitled to a pension under this act; and the loss or lack of a certificate of discharge shall not deprive the applicant of the benefit of this act, but other proof of service performed and an honorable discharge, if satisfactory, shall be deemed sufficient; and when there is no record evidence of such service and such discharge the applicant may establish the same by other satisfactory testimony.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah to explain this bill, and inform the Senate how much money is involved in it. The latter part of the bill seems to be rather loosely drawn.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not able to say just exactly how many of the veterans who took part in the Indian disturbances are still alive. It is estimated, however, that there are about 700. The bill simply proposes to bring the provisions of the present law down to and including the year 1867. The survivors of the Indian wars referred to in the bill, and I suppose of one or two other Indian disturbances, are the only ones now left that are not drawing pensions to-day. The Committee on Pensions unanimously reported this bill. They approved of it last year when it passed the Senate, and they have also approved of it at this session. I need not go over in detail, I suppose, the causes of the war, etc.——

Mr. KEAN. I do not care for that. I only called the Senator's attention to the fact that the latter part of the bill seems to be rather loosely drawn.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will state that the men who engaged in that war were never paid for their services by the Government of the United States, and it is for that reason that the proof of their service as outlined in the bill is left in the condition it is; that is, it must be satisfactory to the Department.

Mr. KEAN. And the Senator thinks from his knowledge of claims that that is a proper provision to make, and that it properly guards the Government against fraud and everything of that kind?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should say yes, under the circumstances.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I understand the bill is now open to amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. On page 2, after line 1, I move to amend by inserting the words "and including those which took place in the State of Minnesota down to and including the year 1862."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, after the date "1867," it is proposed to insert "and including those which took place in the State of Minnesota down to and including the year 1862."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment of the same character as that just offered by the Senator from Minnesota, to include the State of Colorado from 1860 to the close of 1865.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Utah to state that those mentioned in the bill were the only Indian disturbances to which the provisions of the act of July 27, 1892, had not been extended.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I said, as I remember, that the bill applied to the war veterans of Utah of 1867.

Mr. KEAN. I think it ought to include all of them if it is going to pass at all.

Mr. SMOOT. But that there were one or two other States that had similar cases.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I should like to say that during the civil war Colorado had some Indian wars in which we put some—I do not know how many, but 200 or 300—men into the service, and some of them were engaged side by side with the Government troops. Those men have never been paid either by the State or by the General Government, and I know, Mr. President, that the State expended considerable money which has never been repaid; the counties expended a good deal of money, and individuals expended a good deal of money in the same cause. If there is any proposition to pay for such services, we can present as meritorious a case as any other State.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state that this very war cost the State of Utah a little over a million dollars. There was a claim presented here by Hon. Joseph Rawlins, formerly a Senator from the State of Utah, to reimburse the State that amount for moneys and provisions advanced.

Mr. TELLER. But it was not done.

Mr. SMOOT. That claim was never paid, but the service was given by these men, and there is a provision now on the statute books in the interest of the Black Hawk war veterans up to and including 1853. That provision, however, does not reach the later wars of Colorado, Utah, and perhaps of Minnesota. It is for that reason that I introduced this bill, to give the veterans referred to a pensionable status.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bill. It is founded upon justice to those people. I only want to include the people of my State who stand in the same condition as do the others.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to have the same provision inserted in regard to Colorado that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] had inserted regarding Minnesota, except that I want to extend the time down to the close of the year 1865. Some of these disturbances occurred in that year, but I do not remember in what part of the year.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Following the amendment just inserted, it is proposed to insert:

and including those which took place in the State of Colorado during the years from 1862 to 1865, both inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire to propose a further amendment by including Idaho. On line 7, after the word "Utah," I move to insert the word "Idaho."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Idaho could he not offer an amendment that would make the bill general? I think it ought to be made so.

Mr. HEYBURN. An amendment that would make it general would obviate these particular amendments. I desire to cover the Indian wars of Idaho of 1878 and to obviate the necessity of a lot of relief bills, many of which are pending and many of which are very just.

Mr. PERKINS. For the same reason, Mr. President, I desire to include California. But I think the bill ought to be perfected and made a general bill, and therefore I suggest to the Senator that it had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair). The bill will go over at the request of the Senator from California.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from California that the Committee on Pensions have had this subject under consideration for a number of years now, and no one from California has ever intimated to our committee that there were similar conditions in that State.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon an interruption, I might add that as to Minnesota the Pension Committee has just reported a provision as to the Indian wars in Minnesota.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota upon that and know that to be the case; but it seems to me that it is asking something that should not be done in relation to this bill. If California wants a bill applying to any Indian wars that occurred in California similar to this, I think it would be proper to introduce a bill to that effect, and I assure the Senator I will support it.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. PERKINS. I have no desire to object to the passage of this bill, but I have in mind the Indian war in California, known as the "Indian Modoc war." I am not sure whether it has been provided for, and we do not want to be charged with neglect of duty, so far as the interests of our State are concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understand, the war spoken of by the Senator from California has already been taken care of.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the amendment which I offered is before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. KEAN. What is the amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 7, after the words "Territory of Utah," it is proposed to insert "and Territory of Idaho."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. I think the Senator from Idaho ought to be as gracious to the Senate as the Senator from Colorado has been, and postpone his amendment until the matter can be examined.

Mr. HEYBURN. All of the amendment has not been stated.

Mr. KEAN. That may be, but it is of the same nature as the amendment the Senator from California suggested; and the Senator from Idaho has no data in regard to the case at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have.

Mr. KEAN. Not here. It is not that I am opposed to it, but I think it ought to be considered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the amendment be considered so that the record will not be fragmentary.

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to strike out "sixty-seven," on page 1, line 8, and insert in lieu "seventy-nine," so as to read, "eighteen hundred and seventy-nine." I desire to cover the period of our Nez Percé war, which presents the same class of claims exactly as the Senator from Utah is desiring to cover by the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish simply to call attention to the fact that a good many years ago, when I chanced to be chairman of the Committee on Pensions, a general law was passed, which, at that time, was supposed to cover all these old Indian wars. I remember that I went to a good deal of trouble to ascertain whether or not it did, and I am satisfied it did. But since then I think one or two bills have been passed covering some fragments of military companies or regiments which were said to have participated in Indian wars.

Now, we are considering another bill to pension soldiers who were not enlisted, who have no record of service, and who are to be put on the penson roll by parole evidence. I am not going to be technical about this matter; if they rendered service covering a period of thirty days, I presume they ought to be pensioned; but it does seem to me, Mr. President, that it would be very much better if the suggestion made by some Senator a moment ago was adopted, that the consideration of this bill be passed over until a general bill can be drawn. It would save us a good deal of trouble, I am satisfied, in the future as well as at the present time.

This will not end it. We will have other fragments of regiments that killed Indians somewhere, or tried to kill them, coming in and engaging our attention. I want to sound this note of alarm, that after we have got through with this we are going to be asked to pension all the militia organizations of the various States. That, of course, is a separate subject, but it is one we will be called upon to consider. I do really think it would be in the line of good legislation if the Senator from Utah would allow this bill to go over and see if he can not frame a general law that would cover all the cases that have been suggested to-day and make it so broad that it would cover all cases that could be presented to the Bureau of Pensions, where the small amount of proof that is required by this bill was forthcoming. I really feel that that ought to be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course if the Senator from New Hampshire feels that this is not a proper bill and if he would prefer to have a general measure on this subject I certainly do not want to object. But I do feel that this bill should pass as it is. I feel that the men who fought in those wars at that time for the preservation of that country, sparsely settled as it was, in defense of homes there, and virtually for the protection of the property of the United States, ought to be provided for in a bill. The act of June 27, 1902, amending the act of July 27, 1892, granting pensions to the survivors of the Black Hawk war, the Creek war, the Cherokee disturbance, and the Seminole war, extended its provisions to the Utah Indian disturbances of 1850 to 1853, inclusive. I suppose the reason why it did not take in the wars of 1865 and 1866 and 1867 was that there had not been at that time a sufficient lapse of time, as was stated by members of the committee, to justify pensions being granted to the survivors. But I think now the time has come when there should be a law whereby these men can be placed in a position to receive pensions from the Government. I should like very much, of course, to have the bill passed, but if there is objection I shall say no more about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the further consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not object, Mr. President.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator from Utah has no objection—I do not wish to defeat the passage of his bill, because I think it is eminently just—I should like to have the State of Oregon inserted.

Mr. KEAN. If there are further amendments to the bill, I think we ought to follow the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire and have a general bill passed.

Mr. FULTON. I will not ask the adoption of the amendment if it is going to interfere with the passage of the Senator's bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXPOSITION AT QUITO, ECUADOR.

The bill (S. 4633) making an appropriation for the participation by the United States in an exposition to be held at Quito, Ecuador, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, for the participation by the United States in an exposition to be held at Quito, Ecuador, during the year 1909.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FIRST PAN-AMERICAN SCIENTIFIC CONGRESS.

The bill (S. 4634) making an appropriation for the representation of the United States at the First Pan-American Scientific Congress was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $35,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, to enable the Government of the United States to be fittingly represented at the First Pan-American Scientific Congress, to be held at Santiago, Chile, during the year 1908.

Mr. FRYE. After the word "dollars," in line 5, I move to insert "to be immediately available and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AWARD OF BERING SEA ARBITRATION.

The bill (S. 390) to confer jurisdiction upon the circuit court of the United States for the ninth circuit to determine in equity the rights of American citizens under the award of the Bering Sea arbitration of Paris and to render judgment thereon was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President, a similar bill passed the Senate at the last session, and was favorably reported in the House of Representatives, but was not there reached on the Calendar. It is now again favorably reported.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNIE WARD, FORMERLY ANNIE BROWN.

The bill (S. 558) to authorize a patent to be issued to Annie Ward, formerly Annie Brown, for certain lands therein described was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TELLER. I think there ought to be some explanation of the bill.

Mr. GAMBLE rose.

Mr. TELLER. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report at the request of the Senator from Colorado.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. GAMBLE, January 29, 1908, which is as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 558) to authorize a patent to be issued to Annie Ward, formerly Annie Brown, for certain lands therein described, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it back with the recommendation that the same do pass.

The bill proposes to confirm the homestead entry of Annie Ward, formerly Annie Brown, and authorizes the issuance of patent to the land described, and the facts in connection with the case are fully set forth in the report of the Secretary of the Interior upon the bill, which is hereto attached.

The equities in the case appeal very strongly to your committee, as they did to the Secretary of the Interior, shown and admitted by that official's decision in the case and by his suspension of further action respecting the land involved, at the request of Senator HANSBROUGH, until opportunity might be afforded Congress to enact special measure for the relief of this homesteader. Laches on the part of the Department is shown in the delay of practically two years in the allowance of the entrywoman's application to make second entry, and in view of the fact that absolute good faith is shown throughout, as evidenced by the proof, and the further fact that extreme hardship would be inflicted upon the parties in interest by the cancellation of the entry, your committee is of the opinion that the bill should become law.

The report of the Secretary referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 13, 1908.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt from the clerk of your committee of Senate bill 558, with the request for the views of this Department thereon. The bill is entitled "A bill to authorize a patent to be issued to Annie Ward, formerly Annie Brown, for certain lands therein described," and provides:

"That the entry of Annie Ward, formerly Annie Brown, of the southwest quarter of section twenty, township one hundred and forty-four north, range seventy-one west, in the Fargo land district, in the State of North Dakota, held for cancellation by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and ordered canceled by the Secretary of the Interior, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause a patent to the land embraced within said entry to be issued to the said Annie Ward, formerly Annie Brown, provided there is no valid adverse claim for such land."

On May 6, 1902, the beneficiary of the proposed legislation being then a single woman, filed her application to enter the SW. ¼ sec. 20, T. 144 N., R. 71 W., fifth principal meridian, at Fargo, N. Dak., under the homestead law as a second entry. The papers were transmitted to the General Land Office, and on February 8, 1904, the application was allowed, and on June 25, 1904, she made entry No. 28441, Bismarck, N. Dak., series. On May 4, 1906, she submitted commutation proof showing that she began building her house October 15, 1904, into which she moved the following November, and that her actual residence therein was continuous, being absent with her family only one month, in June, 1905, on business in Minnesota, where she was detained by sickness. Her proof shows that her house is 12 by 16 feet, with a kitchen 12 by 12 feet, granary 14 by 20, barn 24 by 36, 80 acres of breaking, 200 trees near the buildings, 45 acres of fenced pasture, well 26 feet deep, curbed with wood, the aggregate value of the improvements being $1,290; that her family consists of "her husband and two children," and that she and her family have continuously resided on the land since first establishing residence thereon. As to the cultivation of the land, the proof shows that in 1902 she broke 10 acres and cultivated it to flax; in 1903 a crop of flax was raised on the same land; in 1905, 70 acres were cropped, 60 to flax and 10 to rye; and in 1906, 80 acres were seeded and being seeded.

The proof shows the establishment and maintenance of an actual bona fide home, and the improvements and cultivation of the land from year to year indicate an honest purpose to continue to make the land a home to the exclusion of a home elsewhere. It was to encourage the making of such homes that induced the passage of the homestead law; but it appearing from her proof that prior to the allowance of her entry she had married, she was required to file an affidavit showing the date of her marriage and whether at that time her husband was claiming a separate tract of land under the homestead law. In response to this she filed her affidavit June 29, 1906, that she was married October 28, 1902, and that her husband made proof upon his homestead entry in April, 1903, and was therefore not claiming a separate tract under the homestead law during the time they were living upon her entry.

Upon consideration thereof by the General Land Office, on April 23, 1907, her commutation proof was rejected and her homestead entry held for cancellation. From this decision she appealed to the Department, and upon consideration thereof by the Department the decision of the General Land Office was affirmed on August, 23, 1907, the Department in this decision citing the act of June 6, 1900 (31 Stat. L., 683), stating that:

"Claimant prior to her marriage took possession of the land and raised a crop thereon, and such cultivation was continued from year to year, but she did not establish residence upon the land until November, 1904. A mere act of settlement upon the land is not sufficient to bring the settler within the protection of the act; she must have 'improved, established, and maintained bona fide residence thereon,' but even if her settlement was sufficient to bring it within the remedial provisions of the act (June 6, 1900) she would be barred by the second proviso that requires the claimant to show 'that the man whom she marries is not at the time of their marriage claiming a separate tract under the homestead law.' The purpose of the act was to guard against the maintenance of two homes at the same time by husband and wife. Even if the claimant prior to marriage had initiated such a settlement right as would be protected by the act of June 6, 1900, it was defeated by her marriage to a man who had at the time of marriage an unperfected homestead which he continued to claim and maintain. While there are many equities in favor of this entryman, the language of the statute is so free from ambiguity as to make it obligatory upon the Department to cancel the entry."

On September 26, 1907, at the request of Hon. H. C. HANSBROUGH, United States Senator, the Department suspended further action respecting the land involved until such time as opportunity might be afforded Congress to enact a special measure for the relief of this homesteader.

In view of the equities of the case above enumerated, the Department has no objection to interpose to the enactment of Senate bill 558, returned herewith, into law.

Very respectfully, JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD, Secretary.

The COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS,
United States Senate.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary to read all of the report. I should like to have it appear in the RECORD, however.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the report will be printed in the RECORD without being further read.

Mr. TELLER. I made the suggestion I did because I thought it was within the power of the Department to give the relief. I am not certain now that it is.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN.

The bill (S. 553) for the relief of certain homestead entrymen was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That no homestead entries heretofore made shall be canceled for the sole reason that persons who made such entries have, under the act entitled "An act relating to public lands," approved June 15, 1880, purchased lands formerly entered by them, and all entries heretofore canceled on that ground may be reinstated upon a showing by the entryman or his heirs, within one year from the approval of this act, that there are no valid grounds for the cancellation of such entries in all cases where valid adverse rights have not attached to the lands covered by such entries since the dates of their cancellation, but this act shall not be construed as validating or authorizing the reinstatement of any entry made under sections 2306 and 2307 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the commutation provisions of the homestead laws shall not apply to any entry confirmed or reinstated under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to have the Senator who reported the bill state approximately how general it is in its application. To how many entries will it apply?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am unable to state the number of entries. I do not think it will apply to a great many entries. There are only a few cases.

Under the law of 1900 we allowed people who had taken a homestead, but had commuted it by paying the cash price for it, to make another entry. In 1880 Congress passed a law for the relief of certain homesteaders, the second section of which I will read, as it has a bearing on this case:

That persons who have heretofore under any of the homestead laws entered lands properly subject to such entry, or persons to whom the right of those having so entered for homesteads, may have been attempted to be transferred by bona fide instrument in writing, may entitle themselves to said lands by paying the Government price therefor, and in no case less than $1.25 per acre, and the amount heretofore paid the Government upon said lands shall be taken as part payment of said price: Provided, This shall in no wise interfere with the rights or claims of others who may have subsequently entered such lands under the homestead laws.

There are not many, but there are a few cases of persons who made entry under that special law. They have made second entries, and they supposed, inasmuch as they paid for the land, that they would be in exactly the same category as the men who had commuted under the law of 1900. But the Department had some scruples about it. The bill as originally introduced was referred to the Department, and they presented a substitute, which is the bill now under consideration, and recommend it.

Mr. WARREN. I have one more question. If I understand the Senator correctly, this does not apply to those who have commuted their homesteads under the general law?

Mr. NELSON. No, it does not apply to them. Inasmuch as these entrymen under this law paid for their land like men who now commute, the bill is intended to put them exactly on the same footing. That is all there is to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. M'DOWELL.

The bill (S. 685) to provide for the payment of John M. McDowell for services rendered in preparing a new set of indices of all the records of Council City recording district of the second judicial district of Alaska was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to John M. McDowell, of Council City, Alaska, a sum not to exceed $3,000 for the services stated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOSPITAL SHIPS.

The bill (S. 4377) to carry into effect the international convention of December 21, 1904, relating to the exemption in time of war of hospital ships from dues and taxes on vessels was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEAN. I ask the Senator from Illinois whether he thinks the preamble ought to be stricken out?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not think it should be.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I do not think it should be stricken out.

The preamble was agreed to.

IMMIGRANT STATION AT PHILADELPHIA, PA.

The bill (H. R. 7694) to provide for the purchase of ground for and the erection of a public building for an immigration station, on a site to be selected for said station, in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar, and was read.

Mr. BACON. Is there a report accompanying the bill? If so, I should like to have it read, unless it is very long.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no report with the bill.

Mr. BACON. The bill carries a considerable appropriation, and we ought at least to know the necessity of it. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will enlighten us on it. I note, however, that the Senator who reported the bill is temporarily absent from the Chamber.

I am not urging any objection to the bill, but I think it is due to us that we should know the reasons which impelled the introduction and the favorable report of the bill. I am sorry that neither the Senator who introduced it nor the Senator who reported it is here. The bill may be all right, but I do think when a bill carrying an appropriation of $250,000 is before the Senate there ought at least to be a report from the committee or a statement from some one representing the committee in order that we know the reasons by which we are actuated in making the appropriation. We are absolutely without any information.

Mr. CLAY. Does the bill come from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was reported from the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. CLAY. It strikes me that a bill of this kind should come from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and that committee reported it back and asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Immigration, which was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. I may say for the information of the Senator from Georgia that this bill is similar to one reported by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] for the establishment of an immigrant station at Boston, which had been recommended by the Department. The bill in regard to Boston has already passed, and this is for an immigrant station at Philadelphia.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator mean to say that this bill has been recommended by the Department and unanimously by the Committee on Immigration?

Mr. KEAN. I am not a member of that committee, but I believe it has. It has already passed the other House.

Mr. CLAY. I know nothing about it. If it came from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds originally, I am on that committee, but have no recollection of it.

Mr. BACON. Unless some one is prepared to make a statement in explanation of the bill I shall object to its present consideration. I do not wish it to lose its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice.

Mr. BACON. Without prejudice. I am perfectly willing to agree to the passage of the bill so soon as we have any information, but there is absolutely none before the Senate now.

STEAM LIGHTER CLIMAX.

The bill (S. 2873) for the relief of the owners of the steam lighter Climax and the cargo laden aboard thereof was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the claim of the owners of the steam lighter Climax, injured and sunk by collision with the United States light-house tender Cactus on the afternoon of the 25th day of November, 1905, in the East River, off the borough of Manhattan, city of New York, for and on account of the loss and injury to the vessel and cargo and damages to the owners thereof, may be submitted to the United States district court of the southern district of New York, under and in compliance with the rules of the court sitting as a court of admiralty, and the court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine and to render judgment thereupon upon the same principles and measures of liability and damages in like cases in admiralty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

The bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

IMMIGRANT STATION AT PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that House bill 7694 was passed over.

Mr. BACON. I will state for the information of the Senator, as he was not in his seat, that it was upon my objection the bill was passed over, not that I knew any valid objection against the passage of the bill, but there was simply a failure of information upon which we could act intelligently. I therefore simply asked that it be passed over without prejudice until the Senator from Massachusetts or some other Senator, in the absence of a printed report, could give us the required information as to the necessity for the erection of this structure.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7694) to provide for the purchase of ground for and the erection of a public building for an immigration station, on a site to be selected for said station, in the city of Philadelphia, Pa. It directs the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor to acquire by purchase or condemnation a suitable site and cause to be erected, complete, thereon a public building to temporarily accommodate and care for immigrants arriving at the city of Philadelphia, Pa., the cost of the site and the complete erection, equipment, and furnishing of the building not to exceed the sum of $250,000.

Mr. LODGE. I reported the bill in behalf of the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. PENROSE), as he was absent from the city at that time. A similar bill passed the Senate for the erection of an immigrant station at Boston.

All the immigrant stations on the Atlantic coast were thoroughly examined by the Immigration Commission, which was created at the last session of Congress, and that Commission was unanimous that there ought to be new stations at Philadelphia and Boston. Neither station is fit for the proper reception of immigrants. Boston has the largest number of immigrants next to New York, reaching some sixty or seventy thousand, and I think Philadelphia has over 50,000 immigrants annually.

I will not take time in saying anything about the Boston station, as that bill has passed, but the Philadelphia station is totally unfit for the reception of immigrants. It is an old building. It is almost impossible to keep it clean, as it should be, though every effort is made in that direction. It is dark, and it is in no wise a proper place in which to keep the people who are detained or in which to receive the people for examination.

The Commission were unanimous in recommending the new stations. The same recommendation was made by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and the Committee on Immigration in both Houses have been unanimous in reporting bills for new stations at these two large ports. All who have examined the matter are of one opinion.

The money necessary for the construction of the station comes from the immigrant fund. It is not a charge upon the Treasury. There is, as Senators are doubtless aware, what is known as "the immigrant fund." All the money coming from the head tax is put into a separate fund in the Treasury, which is used for the expenses of the Immigration Service. That fund has reached over two million and a half dollars. The last act limited the amount in the fund at any one time to two and a half million dollars, and everything above that is covered into the Treasury. There is this large fund derived from the head tax, which is used for the benefit of the service. There is an abundance of money there to pay for these new stations, and I can assure Senators from my personal examination that the need of a new station at Philadelphia is imperative. The appropriation ought to be made.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to make an inquiry of him. Does the Senator regard the erection of these immigrant stations as conducive to the encouragement of immigration into this country?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that is a question which I have not considered. I had not thought that they had any bearing on the amount of immigration into the country one way or the other. But even if I thought the fact that we had good stations encouraged immigration I should still advocate them, although I am not in favor of indiscriminate or unlimited immigration.

I think it becomes us to have proper places for the reception of the people who come here. A considerable percentage of them—women, children, people who are diseased—are detained for examination and have to be deported subsequently, and they ought to be carefully and properly treated.

Mr. CULLOM. Decently, anyway.

Mr. LODGE. There ought to be decent accommodations for them all, such as are at Ellis Island, in New York. I think it is only proper that we should treat these people while they are in the hands of the Government in such a way that their health and morals will be guarded so far as possible.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator that we ought to have proper accommodations for the immigrants when they come, but I think it is very patent that the more agreeable we make the reception the more there is in the way of encouragement for them to come.

I thought, in view of the Senator's very pronounced opposition to immigration, which he has expressed very forcibly in this Chamber, possibly that thought had not occurred to him. But accepting his statement, that whatever might be his attitude in regard to the question of immigration, he would desire that these new stations should be erected, I should like to inquire of him, as he is on the Commission and also upon the Committee on Immigration, how many stations there are along the Atlantic coast outside of the three which he has mentioned?

Mr. LODGE. There is a station at Baltimore, and two stations, which I suppose by this time are completed—one at Galveston and the other at New Orleans—were authorized last year.

Mr. BACON. My inquiry was——

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall now whether there is a station at Norfolk or not. I do not think there is At all events, the number of immigrants arriving there is so small that it is not of consequence.

Mr. BACON. My suggestion was instigated, I may say; somewhat by my interest in the port of Charleston, a port which has manifested some considerable enterprise in the introduction of a desirable class of immigrants, and there was some legislation last year that I thought was decidedly unfriendly to it. As the attitude of the learned Senator from Massachusetts seems to be somewhat changed in regard to the question, I did not know but that while he was in a liberal mood in this matter he might recall the fact that possibly the action taken last year had shut up the port of Charleston to this desirable class of immigrants, and that possibly he might now add to this bill a provision for an immigrant station at Charleston, only for the most desirable class, I will say. None of us desire the undesirable class.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will state for the information of the Senator from Georgia, if the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, that we have already passed a bill, and it is a law, providing for an immigrant station at Charleston. It is a very modest one. I think we got only $50,000, but we got all we asked for.

Mr. LODGE. That is true. I had forgotten Charleston when I mentioned Galveston and New Orleans.

Mr. President, I have not changed my views about immigration, because I wish the immigrants when they arrive here to be properly treated. I do not suppose for one moment that we are going to add to the immigration because it is known that for the twenty-four or forty-eight hours that the mass of them are detained at the port of entry they are treated like human beings and not like cattle. I do not think that will have any effect one way or the other on the tide of immigration, which is moved by causes more potent than the condition of the station at which they are received.

I have been in favor of putting a suitable station wherever there would arrive any considerable number of immigrants. I voted last year for stations at Charleston, Galveston, and New Orleans. Perhaps Senators are not aware how trifling the immigration is at most of those points, and that for a large part of the year the stations are but little used. I think the immigration at New Orleans was something like 4,000, and the immigration at Galveston (I am speaking from memory of six months ago) was something like 6,000 for the previous year. The immigration at Philadelphia was 55,000, and immigrants are arriving there every week. The immigration at Boston reaches 70,000. Sometimes a couple thousand have arrived in a day. There are thousands of immigrants a week who come in at that port. The immigration at New York is over 1,000,000. We have to proportion our stations to the needs of the ports.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the Senator if I am correct in stating that we are receiving in this country now about 1,250,000 foreigners every year?

Mr. LODGE. There were something over 1,100,000 last year, I think. I have not the exact figures, but I think the number was 1,100,000 and odd.

Mr. CLAY. Does not the Senator think the best interests of the country and our future demand that we shall be extremely careful in regard to the introduction of foreigners into this country? Does not the Senator think we have done well in guarding carefully our law and in restricting the class of immigrants that shall come to this country?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the question of immigration is one which I have discussed very often in this body, and I discussed it very often in the other House before I came here. My views upon the question have never changed. I have thoroughly approved of the laws we have had. We have had no strictly restrictive laws as yet except the laws excluding the Chinese.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Senator to favor an educational qualification.

Mr. LODGE. I did, but that has never been adopted.

Mr. CLAY. It was adopted, I think, by the Senate and stricken out by the House.

Mr. LODGE. It was passed by both Houses and vetoed by President Cleveland.

Mr. CLAY. I thought that that feature of the bill was passed by the Senate two sessions ago.

Mr. LODGE. It was. It has passed the Senate three times——

Mr. CLAY. I thought so.

Mr. LODGE. And it has been lost in the House. It passed both Houses and was vetoed by President Cleveland. It passed the Senate again when you, sir, [the Vice-President in the chair] were chairman of the Committee on Immigration, and it was lost in the House; and it passed again last year, and the House again refused to accept it, and it was lost in conference.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is no political color to this discussion; at least I had not supposed there was any politics in it; but if the Senator charges the destruction of the educational qualification to a Democratic President, he ought at least to be fair enough to locate the trouble now with the Republican House.

Mr. LODGE. I was not making a speech with any idea of politics. I do not think immigration is a political question; but the Senator from Georgia was asking about the educational test, and I gave him the history of it. It is simply a fact that the bill carrying the educational test, as it is called, passed both Houses of Congress and was vetoed by President Cleveland. I do not remember the exact year. It was during his second term, and at the time when I was chairman of the Immigration Committee of the Senate. It subsequently passed the Senate and was lost in the House—a Republican House.

Mr. LATIMER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. LATIMER. As I understand the object of this measure, it is simply to give improved conditions at Philadelphia, so that a more thorough examination can be made of immigrants as they arrive in this country. The boarding house, as I understand it, where the immigrants are taken after they are landed from the vessel is now some distance from the place of landing. Upon investigating the immigrant question in Europe, we found that the steamship companies are at a great disadvantage where the boarding houses are in one part of the city and the immigrant station in another, for the reason that the immigrants will be scattered over the city and there will be no opportunity to take care of them and exercise influence over them, and they can not be made as cleanly in their clothing and in the care of their quarters as is the case where magnificent immigration stations are provided, such as are found in many places.

I understand that the station at Philadelphia is an old building, over a hundred years old, and that it is not sufficient to take care of the immigrants when they are landed there. I do not see that that has a thing to do with the question as to whether a man may be for or against the class of immigrants coming into the United States. The object is simply to take care of the people who are coming here under the laws that we have already passed. If we want to further restrict immigration so as to prevent the coming of a class of immigrants to which we are opposed, it is all right to put it into a bill, but I think this measure ought to pass, so as to give accommodation for the people who are now coming under the laws we have already passed.

Mr. LODGE. I had no idea of entering upon any general discussion of the immigration question. It is a question that is always with us, and we shall have a good deal of discussion about it in coming years as we have had in the past, because it is one of the very great problems that confronts this country. I was merely replying as best I could to questions that Senators put to me.

What the Senator from South Carolina says about the building at Philadelphia I had already said, and it is quite true. It is an old freight house that has been turned into an immigrant station. The upper story is used for the immigrants and the lower story for their luggage. I supposed the detention station is there, too; but the Senator may be right about that. Certainly the detention station, wherever it is, is under the control of the Government, and the offices of the immigration commissioner of Philadelphia are a long distance uptown, because there is no suitable place for him and his offices on the spot where they ought to be. The station is very inconvenient; it is not healthy; it is dark, and in every way unsuitable for the reception of human beings, some of whom have been detained there perhaps for several days, or as long as a week—those who have to be deported and those subject to a more careful examination than others.

Whatever views we may any of us hold about immigration, that the measures ought to be simply selective as they now are or that we ought to go further and have restrictive measures. I think we all ought to be agreed that humanity demands that while the people who land upon our shores are under the control of the Government and being examined according to our laws, they should be treated in such a way as to provide for their health and their comfort, and that we should use them with the decency and kindness which is becoming on the part of a nation like that of the United States.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not understand that there has been any objection expressed by anyone to the passage of the pending bill. Personally, I have none. On the contrary, I quite agree that the Government should establish at the proper ports suitable houses for the reception and examination of immigrants. My purpose in calling attention to it was twofold. I had a little curiosity to know whether there had been changes of views by certain Senators in regard to the matter of immigration. Then, forgetting for the moment that we had already provided for Charleston, and recollecting the fact that there had been a matter of legislation which seemed to me to be directed quite particularly at that port, I felt an interest to know whether we might not at this time provide for Charleston. But that is provided for I understand, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall approve the passage of the bill and vote for it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, there are some executive communications which should be acted upon, and therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

CONSIDERATION OF BILLS ON THE CALENDAR.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume consideration of the bills on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bills on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

PORT OF CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

The bill (H. R. 558) to extend to the port of Chattanooga, Tenn., the privileges of immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to extend the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," to the port of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I should like to know what the statute is that is referred to in the bill. I ask whether there is a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no report noted as being with the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Then I wish some Senator would explain the bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, there was a report made on the bill in the House of Representatives, which report was adopted by the Senate committee and is with the papers, I take it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report is not indicated upon the Calendar.

Mr. McLAURIN. The report of the House committee was handed in when the bill was reported, as I happen to know, having myself reported it.

Mr. NELSON. I think I can explain to the Senator from Colorado. The bill went to the Committee on Commerce. In all such cases we refer the bills to the Treasury Department. This bill was referred to the Treasury Department, and they sent in a letter of recommendation in its favor. The letter is not quoted, but the Treasury Department favors the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC DOMAIN IN THE STATE OF MINNESOTA.

The bill (S. 2495) restoring a certain tract of public land in the State of Minnesota to the public domain was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, after the word "thirty," to insert:

And the point of land in section 18, extending from lot 1 in section 19, omitted from the original United States land survey, but which is shown upon the plat of survey made under the direction of the War Department by the United States engineer office at St. Paul, for the Gull Lake Reservoir, in Minnesota, which said land was reserved for reservoir purposes and the reservation approved by the President January 18, 1896.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described land, to wit, the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 30, and the point of land in section 18, extending from lot 1 in section 19, omitted from the original United States land survey, but which is shown upon the plat of survey made under the direction of the War Department by the United States engineer office at St. Paul, for the Gull Lake Reservoir, in Minnesota, which said land was reserved for reservoir purposes and the reservation approved by the President January 18, 1896, in township 134 north, of range 29 west, in the State of Minnesota, be, and the same hereby is, restored to the public domain subject to homestead entry; and all prior rights of settlement and entry, or attempted entry, are hereby reserved to the occupant and claimant of the land, to be passed upon and determined by the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided, however, That any homestead entry of said land or final certificate or patent that may be issued therefor, shall be subject to the right of the United States to construct and maintain a dam for reservoir purposes at Gull Lake and to flood any part of said land by means of said dam.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill restoring certain tracts of public land in the State of Minnesota to the public domain."

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 4, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS OF WIDOWS AND MINOR CHILDREN.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to take up the bill H. R. 15653, suspend the rules, and pass the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15653) to increase the pension of widows, minor children, and so forth, of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, and so forth, and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the rate of pension for widows, minor children under the age of 16 years, and helpless minors, as defined by existing laws, now on the roll or hereafter to be placed on the pension roll and entitled to receive a less rate than hereinafter provided, shall be $12 per month; and nothing herein shall be construed to affect the existing allowance of $2 per month for each child under the age of 16 years and for each helpless child; and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

SEC. 2. That if any officer or enlisted man who served ninety days or more in the Army or Navy of the United States during the late civil war and who has been honorably discharged therefrom has died or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow, such widow shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his army or navy service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the application therefor under this act at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood, provided that said widow shall have married said soldier or sailor prior to June 27, 1890; and the benefits of this section shall include those widows whose husbands are given a pensionable status under the act of February 15, 1895, and the joint resolutions of July 1, 1902, and June 28, 1906.

SEC. 3. That no claim agent or attorney shall be recognized in the adjudication of claims under the first section of this act, and that no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of the second section of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only upon the order of the Commissioner of Pensions by the pension agent making payment of the pension allowed; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section or who shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill just read. Is a second demanded?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in order that we may have an explanation of this important bill, I demand a second for that purpose, and ask the gentleman from New Hampshire to explain the bill.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to accomplish two purposes—two results, and only two.

The first section of the bill relates only to the ratings of the pensions of widows and minor children. It makes the minimum pension if enacted into law $12 instead of $8 per month. It in no way changes existing law as far as the claims are concerned. It relates solely to the rating, and only the rating, and will make the rate of pension $12 instead of $8 per month. Your committee believe the time has arrived when every widow of a soldier who served the requisite length of time to give her a pensionable status under existing law should not be compelled or asked to live on a pension of $8 per month. [Applause.]

The second section does this one other thing, and these are the two things and the only two things which are done by the bill: In the act of 1890, we unwisely, I believe, and I thought so at the time, provided that if a widow had an income of $250 per year she was not pensionable. The result of that has been that in all human probability it has cost the Government more to investigate, appraise, ascertain, guess, wonder, and query whether a woman by some sort of economy in life had acquired and would possibly have received or should have received an income of $250 a year than it would have cost to give her the pension. This feature of the present law has worked a great injustice to many widows who, on account of the interpretation of the law by the Bureau, have been kept off the pension rolls. As to how this operated I will give you an instance of a case that came within my own knowledge. A soldier went through four years of the war and left a widow and daughter. He died without leaving a will. Under the law in our State the daughter took two-thirds of the property. The widow made an application for pension and the special examiner went there and reported that there was so much real estate, this much of this and that much of that, and while it was mortgaged for all it was worth, and the daughter was entitled to two-thirds of it, the widow was charged up with every bit of the property, while in reality she had scarcely enough left in her equities to buy a barrel of flour. The claim was rejected. Another claim was then filed, and the whole proposition was gone over again, and finally the special examiner said they had a clay bank which might be sold for brickmaking, when in reality there was not a brick kiln within 20 miles of the place. The clay would not have been worth drawing. Finally, after months and months of effort, her pension was allowed. I speak of this to show the way in which this feature of the act of 1890 works. Your committee, believing that it was wise to strike that provision from the bill, have recommended this legislation; and that, with the rating in the first section, is all there is in this bill. It has the unanimous support of the committee.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman tell the House how much money this bill will cost?

Mr. SULLOWAY. It is estimated in the report of the committee that it will take some $12,000,000.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will allow me, I think the estimate made by the Commissioner of Pensions is that this bill, by increasing the pensions of widows who are now receiving pensions, would only add to the pension rolls a little over $6,000,000.

Mr. SULLOWAY. This would be true if it only applied to civil-war widows, but it takes in the widows of all wars, which makes the additional increase.

Mr. BONYNGE. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether, if a soldier was discharged from the service on account of injuries or disabilities incurred in the service prior to the expiration of ninety days, his widow can obtain a pension under this bill without showing that the soldier died from the effects of wounds or disabilities contracted in the service?

Mr. SULLOWAY. This bill in no way changes existing law in that respect.

Mr. BONYNGE. Is there any reason why the widow of a soldier who was discharged prior to the ninety days of service on account of wounds or injuries incurred in the service should not have a pensionable status?

Mr. SULLOWAY. That is not the question before the House at this time.

Mr. KEIFER. She can get that.

Mr. BONYNGE. Not without showing that the soldier died from the effects of wounds or disabilities.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I will, although I would like to inquire whether our friend on the other side wants to occupy any time or not?

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to inquire whether the committee has considered the proposition of changing the provisions in the act of 1890, by which the date of marriage might be extended to a later period?

Mr. SULLOWAY. We have made no change from that law in this bill in this respect.

Mr. SCOTT. Is there likely to be any recommendation from the committee in regard to that?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I can not speak for the committee on that. I think that this is about all we should do at this time.

If this bill becomes a law, it will relieve a great many Members who have bills pending increasing the pensions of widows suffering with physical disabilities, distressed by poverty and mental anguish. With this class of cases eliminated it will give your committee more time and attention for other meritorious claims.

The one great class of pensioners who will be benefited if this becomes a law appeals to me and my sense of justice most strongly, and I believe that all fair-minded people will agree with me when I state the fact that of the 184,000 widows who are drawing pensions of only $8 per month under the act of June 27, 1890, more than 30 per cent, or 54,000, were the wives of the soldiers during the war, each one of whom shared with her soldier husband in the hardships, caring for the home and children, if children they had. Her anxiety never for one moment ceased. She never kissed the little ones to bed at night knowing whether the husband and father was living or dead, whether he was wounded and suffering on some bloody field of battle, or a prisoner hungry and starving, her children fatherless, and she a widow. To such this nation owes what it can never repay, and in the declining years of these widows we can grant them this increase of pension to $12 per month, and I believe for so doing it will be said, "Well done!" [Applause.]

Without taking more time, I will print as a part of my remarks the report of the committee accompanying the bill, which contains a detailed statement of the result that will be accomplished if the bill is enacted into law.

[House Report No. 531, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15653) to increase the pension of widows, minor children, and of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, etc., and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, submit the following report:

A year ago Congress passed an act granting pensions to certain soldiers of the late civil war and the war with Mexico, known as the McCumber Act, which provided a minimum rate of $12 per month to soldiers who had arrived at the age of 62 years and a maximum rate of $20 per month to those who had arrived at the age of 75 years.

No provision for an increased rate of pension was then made for the widows of the soldiers who served in these wars, and, fully realizing that while it is not the policy of the Government to provide full support for widows of soldiers, your committee believe that an increased rate of pension for these widows should nevertheless be granted to prevent absolute want.

Your committee now presents a bill granting to the widows of soldiers of all wars who are now receiving, or may hereafter be entitled to receive, a pension of $8 per month, an increase of $4 per month, so as to make their pension $12 per month.

This part of the bill goes into effect from the date of its passage, and the increased rate is granted to those widows who are now drawing pensions without the necessity of making application at the Pension Bureau, as the same mode of procedure can be applied to the execution of this act as has heretofore been done when the pension of general-law widows was increased from $8 to $12 per month under the act of March 19, 1886, and the minimum rate of pension of $6 per month was established by the act of March 2, 1895, namely, through the several agencies for the payment of pensions.

At the same time the bill provides in section 2 that, from and after the date of its passage, applications for widows' pensions under the act of June 27, 1890, as amended by the act of May 9, 1900, may be made by and allowed to those widows who formerly were barred thereunder by reason of the fact that they possessed resources from which an actual net income in excess of $250 per annum was derived or derivable.

These widows will be granted the same rate of pension as those mentioned in section 1, and the same limitation as to date of marriage is made applicable to them as is contained in the original act of June 27, 1890.

This section of the bill, it will be seen, is not retroactive; hence application for its benefits must be made to the Pension Bureau after the date of its passage.

It has been found in the adjudication of this class of claims under existing law (act of May 9, 1900) that the Pension Bureau has been put to great expense to arrive at a just finding in these claims, many of which had to be placed in the hands of special examiners to determine the question of dependence, and many of which were rejected upon the sole ground that because the claimant owned property which was used as a home the potential income from the same would exceed $250 per annum. By eliminating this proof of dependence the Pension Bureau will save almost as much in expenses as the additional burden to the pension appropriation bill will entail.

The cost of the bill if enacted into law will approximate $12,741,300 per year, divided as follows, this estimate being based on the number of widows, minor children, and helpless minors on the pension roll on June 30, 1907:

CIVIL WAR.
183,671 widows, minors, and helpless minors, pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, at an increased rate of $48 per year	$8,816,208
2,486 widows pensioned under the general law at $8 per month (act of March 19, 1886), at an increase of $48 per year	119,328
MEXICAN WAR.
6,880 widows, at an increase of $48 per year	330,240
INDIAN WARS.
3,081 widows, at an increase of $48 per year	147,888
REGULAR ESTABLISHMENT.
172 widows, at an increase of $48 per year	8,256
SPANISH WAR.
153 widows, at an increase of $48 per year	7,344
Total	9,429,264

It is estimated that about 18,000 widows may apply for pension under the second section of this bill (having had no prior title by reason of their nondependence under the act of May 9, 1900). The cost of these claims at $144 per year will amount to $2,592,000.

It is further estimated that there will be a yearly increase in the number of widow pensioners (over and above the loss by death) of about 5,000, which would further increase the annual cost to the amount of $720,000, so that the total cost of this bill if enacted into law will amount to about $12,741,000.

The first section of the bill, as above stated, applies to every widow pensioner now on the rolls at $8 per month and includes, therefore, not only the widows of soldiers who served in the civil war, but those who served in the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, the war with Spain, the regular military and naval peace establishment, and one widow of the war of 1812 receiving a pension of $8 only.

The committee unanimously recommend the passage of the bill, believing that the benefits therein granted are fully merited.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to hear the gentleman speak so positively and discouragingly as to the prospect of early legislation along the line indicated by the questions which I addressed to him. The act of June 27, 1890, very properly contained a provision limiting its benefits to those women who had married their soldier husbands prior to the passage of the act. But it will now soon be eighteen years since that act was passed. Men who have now reached the age of 70 were then but 52 years old—in the very prime of their physical and mental strength. To hold that a woman who married a soldier any time within ten years after the passage of that act with full knowledge that by the very terms of the act she would be barred from a pension in the event of his death—to hold that under such circumstances a woman contracted marriage with a soldier for the low and mercenary motive of drawing a pension after his death—seems to me preposterous. In point of fact there is not a man on this floor who does not know, within the range of his own acquaintance, scores of cases in which the soldier husband remained in vigorous health, easily earning an ample livelihood for years after a marriage which occurred subsequent to the passage of the act of 1890, but who finally succumbed to disease, often of a lingering nature, which not only robbed him of his earning capacity but made him a constant burden and expense upon his family. Personally I know of many cases, and I doubt not in the aggregate there are thousands of them, in which the husband thus stricken remained in helplessness until the little property he had accumulated had all been dissipated, and until the strength and health of his wife had also been shattered by days and nights of ceaseless vigil, so that when at last death relieved him of his suffering his widow was left penniless, hopeless, and helpless, forced in her old age to become a public charge or to become the humiliated recipient of grudging private charity. Surely in such cases as these there is a touching and powerful appeal, not only to our sympathies but to our sense of justice, and I regret exceedingly that the measure before us does not lift the ban and confer its benefits on all widows of soldiers, no matter when the marriage was contracted. Unfortunately the bill comes before the House under a rule which makes amendment impossible, and I shall therefore, not attempt to have it amended. I can not but believe, however, that before very long this House will be given an opportunity to do justice to a most deserving class of devoted women.

While addressing myself to this general subject, Mr. Speaker, I beg to say a few words touching other changes in our pension laws, which I think are demanded by every consideration of humanity and patriotism. Four years ago I had the honor to introduce into this body a bill providing a pension of $30 a month to all honorably discharged civil war soldiers who, by reason of injury or disease, whether incurred in the service or out of it, were rendered so far helpless as to require the constant attendance of another person. One reason why I wished that bill passed was because it would practically eliminate what has been so frequently referred to as the "special-bill evil"—eliminate it by making it unnecessary.

As it is now, the passage of a special act giving any soldier a higher pension than he would be entitled to under any general law is necessarily unfair discrimination. One man is chosen from among hundreds or perhaps thousands of his comrades, all just as deserving as he, and for his individual benefit the whole legislative machinery of the nation is set to work. With the utmost possible diligence on the part of our Committee on Invalid Pensions and their clerks it is physically impossible, as we all know, to reach more than a mere fraction of the cases that we know to be deserving. In my own district I have no doubt there are at least 100 ex-soldiers, each of whom is wholly without income except the pension he may now be receiving under some general law and each not only incapable of earning anything, but in a condition of practical physical helplessness. No amount of importunity or diligence on my part could make it possible for me to secure the passage of a bill for the relief of more than five or six of these men when such relief can only be afforded through a special act, and yet they all deserve relief as much as any one of them does. We know that the pension of twelve, fifteen, or twenty dollars a month which these men are now receiving is not sufficient to provide them and those who wait upon them with the barest necessaries of life. The difference between what they now receive and what their living actually costs must be made up to them by public charity or private beneficence; it must come from the contributions of their friends or from the charity funds of the town or the county in which they live. Would it not be vastly better if this difference between the pension that they now receive and what their living actually costs should be made up by the Government, not grudgingly as an act of charity, but proudly as the payment of a debt of honor and gratitude for the sacrifices these men endured and for the immeasurable service they rendered?

There is still another measure pending before our Pension Committee, Mr. Speaker, which I most earnestly hope will receive early and favorable consideration. It is a bill introduced by my colleague, Mr. ANTHONY, to give a pensionable status to the men who served in the Kansas State Militia during the civil war. It was in the very high tide of the rebellion, when every man of the regular troops in the field was needed at the storm centers of the conflict, that Gen. Sterling Price, of the Confederate army, with 20,000 men under him, started on his raid through Missouri and Kansas. That this raid must be resisted, and that many thousand troops would have had to be withdrawn from the main lines of battle where they were so sorely needed had it not been for the services of the Kansas Militia goes without argument. But with the courage and patriotism which so distinguished all our citizens throughout that period the few men who remained in Kansas—for Kansas sent a greater proportion of her citizens into the Union armies than any other State in the Union—the boys and the old men responded to the governor's call and, uniting with the few regular troops which were available under the command of United States officers, drove the enemy from the State, rendering in thirty days a service which, in point of hardship endured and losses suffered and results achieved, might compare favorably with many other campaigns of many times longer duration. It is true that these men were in the service of Kansas only and were never enrolled in the armies of the United States; but it is also true that they did not stop at the State line when pursuit of the enemy led them beyond it, and it is true that the service they rendered was a service to the nation, for it was against the enemies of the nation and not against the enemies of Kansas only that they fought. In all justice and patriotism, therefore, the survivors of these militia regiments are entitled to the honor which their recognition upon equal footing with the regularly enlisted soldiers of the Union would give them, and to the succor which the modest pension would afford them now in the days of their weakness and poverty and age.

In what I have said I do not wish to convey a hint of unkind criticism against the members of our Pension Committee nor to appear lacking in appreciation of the splendidly generous pension legislation which this committee has in years past initiated and is at the present time bringing forward. Experience has shown that the act of February 6, 1907, has increased by $20,000,000 annually the amount our soldiers will receive. It is estimated that the act which will be passed here to-day, increasing the pensions of all widows to $12 a month, will add not less than $12,000,000 annually to the widows' pension roll. Surely a committee which in two successive years brings forward legislation which in the aggregate adds more than $30,000,000 annually to a pension list already generous beyond all precedent, can not be charged with lack of sympathy or patriotism or the sense of justice.

The pension legislation of the United States is a standing and unanswerable rebuke to the pessimist who declares that republics are ungrateful. Never in all the tide of times has a nation treated with such lavish generosity the men who fought its battles, and the women, the wives and mothers who bore their full share of the heavy burden. The soldiers of the district I have the honor to represent are not unmindful of this generosity or lacking in appreciation of it, and I should be but a poor spokesman for them if I were to give any other impression of their sentiment.

But not only the soldiers of my district, Mr. Speaker, but all the other people in it believe that in the directions I have indicated the generosity of this great nation might be still further extended without disadvantage to any of its interests, without appreciable burden to any of its citizens, and with infinite advantage to itself. While I shall vote, therefore, for this measure as it is, I shall do so in the confident hope that it will be followed by other measures of like character but more extended scope that shall still further attest the gratitude of our people to the men who alone made it possible for us to assemble here as the Congress of "The United States of America."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I am in favor of this bill because it carries out a principle of legislation that I believe to be right. I believe the most unfair legislation that is passed by Congress on the pension question is to be found in the private pension bills that we pass; not that I am criticising the Pension Committee, because I believe they have done their work well and thoroughly; but a private pension bill is a matter of favoritism; it is a matter of being able to reach an individual Congressman. I believe all pensioners should be put on the same basis and that we should pass general pension laws that would apply equitably to all soldiers who are entitled to relief and not pass as many private pension bills as we do, but make a general pension law to fit the case as far as practicable. For that reason I favor a general bill of this kind.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, on the first day of this session of Congress I introduced a bill to grant to every widow of a soldier of the civil war who had been honorably discharged a pension of $12 per month. While the present bill is not quite as broad as that measure, I rejoice that I am a member of the committee that unanimously reported this bill, and which very properly will be known as the Sulloway bill, in honor of the committee's distinguished soldier chairman.

This bill increases the pension of 196,443 widows from $8 per month to $12 per month. It includes the widows, minor children, and helpless minors of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, and the war with Spain.

It is estimated that it will add 18,000 new names to the pension rolls who are now excluded therefrom by reason of the fact that by the complex mathematical calculation of the Pension Office their net incomes are in excess of $250 per annum.

The Pension Office has been put to great expense to arrive at a proper finding in these claims, many of which are investigated by special examiners, and this bill will save almost as much in expense as the additional pensions granted will entail.

It is also estimated that the yearly increase in the number of widows' pension is about 5,000, so that this measure will directly benefit and help, in all, 219,443 widows.

The expenses of the Pension Office during the last year on account of widows' pensions was $34,335,015.57, and the estimated increase by this bill will make the total expense for the coming year for the widows and minors $47,076,105.57.

The expense last year was divided as follows:

Widows of the Indian war	$34,775.94
Widows of the Mexican war and dependents	747,648.73
Widows and dependents of the war with Spain	842,548.10
Widows of the civil war, under act of June 27, 1890	18,976,704.22
Widows of the civil war, under general law	12,505,450.21
Widows, regular establishment	737,058.37
Total	34,335,015.57

The increase carried by this bill will be divided as follows:

Widows of the Indian wars	$147,888
Widows of the war with Mexico	330,240
Widows of the war with Spain	7,344
Widows, minors, and helpless minors, act of June 27, 1890	8,816,208
Widows under general law	119,328
Widows under regular establishment	8,256
Total increase	9,429,264
Estimated:
18,000 widows, having no prior title	2,592,000
5,000 widows, estimated increase next year	720,000
Total cost of present bill	12,741,264

By the passage of this bill we not only honor the memory of the gallant soldier dead, whose widows we thus assist, but we impress upon the knightly soldiers living our gratitude for their valor and services in time of need, and give them the assurance of the nation's watchfulness over their widows when they are deprived of their husbands' comfort and support. [Applause.]

The widows are entitled to this consideration and the benefits of this bill. Most of them are advanced in years and many have no other income than their small pensions. Their husbands came to the support of this Government in its hour of need, and a great and prosperous nation should save their widows from want and afford them the comforts of life. This is not a measure of charity, but an act of justice; not a matter of sympathy, but a token of gratitude. Gratitude to the men who defeated the army of Mexico and added to our territory the great Southwest and to our wealth untold millions; to the men who preserved the nation and cemented the Union of States; to the men who rescued Cuba from a tyranny that was both cruel and exacting. The story of the patriotism, bravery, and heroism of these men will be forever cherished in the recollection of a grateful people and the poet's lyre will forever sing their praise with its choicest notes. [Applause.]

The people do not begrudge this money for the care and support and the comfort of these widows. They remember the hardships, sufferings, and deprivations endured by their husbands. They recall the heroic patriotism of the soldiers who left their homes and loved ones and presented themselves to their country to be uniformed for battle and robed for death. "No pen will ever place on history's page the full measure of domestic tenderness and heroic patriotism of the volunteer soldier who at the gate of his humble cottage, with weeping wife at his side and loving children at his feet, gave in solemn tones to the muster officer his name for the army."

Under the law now (act of June 27, 1890) for the widow to receive $8 per month she must be without income or means of support other than her daily labor and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year. Under the rigid rules of the Pension Office the rent of the home, if owned by the widow, is counted as part of that income, and frequently this alone equals one-half the total sum allowed.

This was not a liberal construction of that law, but no doubt was a correct technical interpretation thereof. Under existing law for a widow to receive $12 per month her marriage must have been prior to 1886 and her husband's death must have been due to Army service.

The widow's need of a pension is not based upon the cause of her husband's death, and this amount of pension should not be measured thereby. "It is true the widows did not fight upon the field of battle, but in all wars there are battles fought and victories won far removed from the smoke of battle and the noise of guns. In the homes were wives fighting the battle for support of their families while husbands were fighting the battles of their country. [Applause.]

"These noble women passed many days and nights in dread and fear while waiting for the report of battles to scan the list that contained the names of dead and wounded. They were as faithful and loyal as the soldier in battle." No monuments have been erected to their memory and no statues commemorate their virtues, but a grateful nation should ever hold them in loving remembrance. [Applause.]

While this bill helps the widows, and the soldiers of the country will rejoice at its passage, yet I would like to see this Congress pass some liberal measure for those brave men who fought the battles and endured the hardships and privations of Army service. The soldiers have now arrived at an advanced age, their physical disabilities render manual labor impossible, and their pensions are inadequate for their support and comfort. No mere money consideration can pay them for the pain and suffering and the hardships and privations they endured, and a more liberal pension would be a recognition of their services.

This country can well afford to furnish these soldiers with such pensions as to assure them the comforts of life and a proper support.

When the country needed help they responded to the call. They came from the farms, the shops, the mills, and the professions, each man anxious to do a soldier's duty. These men, trained to the pursuits of peace, abandoned their avocations and became soldiers. In battle, on the march, in camp, hospital, and prison they displayed the loftiest elements of patriotism. Their work and its results are woven into the country's history and have become the sacred possession of our people. I have introduced a bill materially increasing the pensions of our soldiers, and I hope to see them all receive not less than $30 per month, or at least $24 per month; personally I prefer the larger amount. They would then know that their services had been appreciated and the appreciation shown in a substantial manner. The bill giving $30 per month to soldiers who had served eighteen months and over and $20 for those of shorter service would be gratefully appreciated. I hope some measure of assistance will be passed by this Congress, but as a rule we are told to wait; but while we wait thousands of these brave men are dying yearly.

Their ranks are gradually getting thinner, and but a few years more and the last of these soldiers will be laid to rest and their services and history will be but a treasured memory.

The McCumber Act of February 6, 1907, was a help to many deserving soldiers. It is based on age alone, where the service was ninety days and the discharge honorable. To June 30, 1907, the end of the fiscal year, there had been added but 1,794 new names to the pension roll, although 120,355 claims had been allowed. The reissue of certificates to the Mexican soldiers numbered 2,195 and those of the civil war 116,366. These figures plainly demonstrate that its chief beneficiaries are those whose mental or physical disabilities allowed them a pension under former laws, but a smaller amount than given under this law. These represent but one-third the claims filed, but the percentage of original pensions granted would, no doubt, be about the same, so that the total new names will be between 5,000 and 6,000.

Prior to 1890 our pension laws were based solely upon physical or mental disability of the claimant, and these must have been proven to have been of service origin. Physical disability, no matter how great, would not answer; such disability must be clearly proven to be due to Army service. Proof satisfactory to the Bureau was difficult to obtain; comrades were dead, hospital records frequently silent, and thousands of worthy and deserving cases were disallowed. Thousands of soldiers who had given from one to four years' service to their country, who were suffering from diseases that rendered them unable to earn a living, were denied recognition or help from the nation they had preserved. The protest became so loud, the wrongs inflicted so great, that the act of June 29, 1890, was passed, and this gave to the soldier with ninety days' service and honorably discharged a pension of six to twelve dollars if he was disabled from the performance of manual labor, by reason of physical or mental disability, rendering him unable in a greater or lesser degree to earn a living.

The disability of Army service entitling a soldier to $30 per month would secure but $12 under this act. There are many thousands of helpless soldiers to-day, many of them blind and paralyzed, who receive but $12 per month.

There are thousands more so weakened by disease as to render them wholly unfit for manual labor who depend almost entirely upon a pension of only $12 per month. Their condition can not be satisfactorily established to be due to their Army service. Many of them had from two to four years of hard and exacting Army service. It is certainly true that years or even months of military duty in the field, exposed to the storms of winter, suffering untold hardships, and enduring many privations, would weaken the physical system and render it less able to resist disease. Prisoners of war for months would naturally be susceptible to disease, their systems weakened by confinement. Is it not time to recognize these facts and help those with a substantial pension who are not able to help themselves? Are they not entitled to $30 per month?

They responded when the country called; they gave their services when needed; they fought the country's battle; they won its victories; they saved the Union. Are they not entitled to fair treatment? They did not enlist for pay; money was not considered, ambition did not whisper in their ears, military renown was not dreamed of; they went to support their country and to do a soldier's and a citizen's duty, and now, in their old age and helplessness, this nation can afford to be generous to these men. Such a law would allow large sums of money now used in the administration of the Pension Office to be applied to the payment of pensions.

Last year the expenses of the Pension Bureau were as follows:

Medical examinations	$490,573.59
Salaries at pension agencies	499,845.44
Rents and contingent expenses	31,321.70
Examinations of agencies	47.55
Salaries, Pension Bureau	1,696,096.69
Special examiners	434,318.70
Total	3,152,113.68

While the added expense would be great, yet when we consider our resources and wealth and our lavish expenditures in all other governmental departments, it does not appear so large. Economical expenditures in the Government service instead of extravagant expenses would save more than these pensions would amount to. The people would never protest or object to generous treatment of the soldier. Four new battle ships will cost about forty millions, and it is said they will be provided for.

The pension roll is now smaller than it has been since 1893. It now contains 967,371 names, the total net loss last year being 18,600. The survivors of the civil war on the pension roll now number 644,338. The deaths last year of these soldiers were 31,201.

The passage of this bill is in response to the universal demand for fair treatment of the soldiers' widows. I am glad to support it and to have aided as a member of the Invalid Pensions Committee in securing a favorable and unanimous report recommending its passage.

I was glad to support and vote for the McCumber Act of February 6, 1907, and hope for an opportunity to still further assist the soldiers by voting for a more liberal and generous pension law.

Now, nearly forty-five years after the close of the war, our nation, strong and prosperous, must not longer neglect those who came to its rescue when in danger and preserved it when in peril. I can but reiterate a portion of what I said February 4, 1907, when the McCumber bill was before the House for consideration.

The soldiers were modest in their demands upon the country for help; they appreciated the enormous indebtedness of the nation at the close of the war, and ten years after its close but 5 per cent of the surviving soldiers had applied for pensions. This small per cent included all those who had been wounded, those enfeebled in prison confinement, and those suffering from diseases contracted in the service. And now, forty-two years after the close of that war, in our strength and prosperity we should not neglect our defenders who supported us in our weakness and need. On every battlefield of the war they gave added testimony to the high character and quality of American soldiery. They exhibited the same American spirit that characterized the achievements of the Revolutionary war. Their bravery and devotion have immortalized the battlefields of the civil war, and their struggles forever settled the question of human slavery and peaceful separation. The settlement was right, and all sections to-day ratify that solution, and the character of the nation at home and abroad is higher by reason of that war. They established beyond question the American doctrine that the volunteer soldiery, taken from the pursuits of industrial life, can be depended upon to defend the country in time of war. The American citizen, trained to peace and the pursuits of industry, leaves his farm, quits his employment, and abandons his books and profession when his country calls. How gladly and proudly he marches forth to battle for his country's cause! From the independence of the farm and from the struggles of the city, of all political opinions and with all religious creeds, the soldiers come, all devoted to a common cause. The hardships of war cheerfully suffered; the brunt of battle gladly borne; defeat in battle but arouses him to more vigorous action; and victory is followed by magnanimity and kindness. His fame will be heard for centuries, and the poet's lyre will forever sing his praises with her choicest notes. The American soldier was the pride of the eighteenth century, the marvel of the nineteenth, and the glory of the twentieth. [Applause.]

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire first whether or not an amendment will be entertained at this time to this bill?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules it is not in order.

Mr. FULTON. I do not desire anyone to think for a moment because of the question asked that I am opposed to the bill in its present form or that I would retard its passage. On the contrary, I heartily indorse it. I take the position, however, that it does not go far enough. I go on the theory that when you desire to reward persons you should reward them in proportion to the service rendered. While it is true that those who took part in the memorable conflict of 1860 and 1865 set a standard for bravery and heroism that never has been, and I doubt ever will be, equaled in the history of the world, yet we had bravery and heroism of as high a type displayed by their wives at home.

As my friend from Indiana [Mr. DIXON] just remarked, we had battles of various kinds in that war. The average soldier went through but a few battles in his years of service, but the mother and wife went through battles every day of the year and every minute of the day. We had brave men on both sides in 1860–1865, but we had brave men simply and only because we had brave women at home. I wish it were possible that our Government might reward, as they should be rewarded, these women, no matter whether they lived in the northland or in the southland, because they all suffered and endured like hardships and privations.

Now, not only were these women an inspiration to the soldiers in the field, because women are always an inspiration, and the soldier on the firing line never could have accomplished the deeds of gallantry that he did if it had not been for the mothers and wives and sisters who held up his hands and cheered him on, but they contributed in many other ways. Many of them—in fact, the great majority of them—took up the additional burden of their husband's business and carried it on successfully during those four years. Thousands of brave and noble women, women of culture and refinement, worked as common farm laborers in order to support themselves and their children. My own dear mother's experience—and I trust I will be pardoned for relating it—was not dissimilar to those thousands of women. When my father enlisted she was left alone upon a farm in western Iowa, with five small children to support, the eldest but 10 years of age, and time and again I have heard her tell how she would lariat the two youngest to the bedpost and, with the other three accompanying her, would go into the field, and with her own hands unassisted planted and harvested the crops for four long years; and if the thousands of women of the civil war were here to speak to-day, every one of them could tell of a similar experience of hardship and privation.

I ask, therefore, gentlemen, if such service is not entitled to due reward? We will have our mothers with us for only a few short years, and can we not make their last days a little more pleasant, a little more easy, a little fuller of the comforts of life? Of course my mother and the mothers of Members of this House may not need this assistance, but somebody's mother does. In fact, the great majority of the widows of veterans need this assistance. Twelve dollars a month is entirely inadequate. I would like to have offered an amendment paying them $30 dollars a month in order that they may spend their last days in ease and comfort. I do not believe that in their old age they should be compelled to support themselves by labor, nor should they be compelled to live upon the charity of friends. We have the richest country in the world to-day; we have millions of dollars locked in the Treasury; we spend hundreds of millions of dollars every year in public improvements, and why can we not take a little of this money—it would not hurt our country any—and use it to bring a little sunshine and a little comfort and a little ease and a little pleasure into the lives of those who have endured and suffered? For that reason I wish it were in order that we might have this bill amended so as to carry $30 a month instead of only $12. [Applause.]

Those having the bill in charge, however, have seen fit to bring it before the House under the rule that no amendments can be offered, so all I can do is simply to voice my sentiments. I am firmly convinced that an amendment raising the monthly payment to $30 would carry by an overwhelming majority, and I believe we should have an opportunity to vote on it. The bill, however, is a recognition—although a very small one—of the services rendered by noble women, and for that reason, and knowing how much the great majority of them are in need of assistance, I shall vote for the bill with pleasure, trusting that those who control legislation in the House will later on report a bill more equitable and just.

If it were permissible, I should also at this time offer an amendment providing for a pension of $40 a month for every honorably discharged soldier of the civil war. Early in the session I introduced such a bill, which is now pending before the same committee which reported the one now under discussion. This bill is H. R. 6100 and reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6100) to provide a pension for all surviving officers and enlisted men in the military and naval service of the United States in the war of the rebellion.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is directed to place on the pension roll the names of all surviving officers and enlisted and drafted men, including militia and volunteers of the military and naval forces of the United States, who served not less than sixty days in the war of the rebellion and who were honorably discharged.

SEC. 2. That pensions under the preceding section shall be at the uniform rate of $40 per month and shall be paid to the person entitled thereto for the term of his life from and after the 1st day of July, 1908: Provided, That said section shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of $40 or more per month, nor to any person who is receiving a pension less than $40 per month, except for the difference between the pension now received and $40 per month.

This bill expresses my views on the pension question. If we are going to reward our old soldiers for services rendered, let us do it in a substantial way, and let us do it before they are all dead. If I had my way I would absolutely wipe out of existence the entire system of red tape which prevails in our Pension Department and say to every old soldier, "Show your discharge and take your pension." In fact, I would make it as easy for him to get a pension as it is to get a check cashed, and that is just what my bill will do if it were a law. It is true it might result in depriving a few clerks of a job, or a few pension attorneys of a fee, but on the other hand it would bring a little ease and a little more comfort to thousands of veterans who are rapidly nearing the end of the journey of life.

I wish it were possible to get the expression of this House on my bill. If there is anything wrong with it I would like to know it. It might be said that it will cost our Government too much, but I have made a hurried calculation and am convinced that it would not increase our disbursements for pensions over $150,000,000 a year, and while this is a large sum of money, yet less than three months ago, at the beginning of our present panic, the Administration issued $150,000,000 in bonds simply to protect and assist a few of our great financiers, who, the chances are a thousand to one, never did one-tenth, nay, one-hundredth as much for our country as one old soldier has done. But if $40 a month is too much, then cut it down to thirty; if thirty is too much, cut it down to twenty-five, but do something. Those who comprise the majority have always claimed to be the friend of the old soldiers; they now have an opportunity to show it, as it rests with them whether or not my bill ever comes to a vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HACKNEY].

Mr. HACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that this bill meets my hearty approval. I believe that the time has come when the property limitation on the widows' right to pension should be stricken out. I believe it is the experience of every Member, as referred to by the chairman of the committee, that gross injustice has been done in every part of the country in excluding from the bounties of the Government those widows who for the time being had only a small amount of property. The law could be so construed as to make this property meet the limitation fixed by the statute; and thousands of destitute widows have been turned away as having a competency when they had not sufficient to keep them from want. I believe that every widow of a soldier, who served the time fixed by this bill, ought to have at least $12 a month. I believe in raising the widow's pension from the minimum of $8, because I think that the $8 per month is wholly inadequate to represent the bounty that this Government feels it ought to pay to that class of people. I say that no money is better distributed in bounty from the Government than in giving pensions to soldiers and to the widows of soldiers and their helpless orphans. Into every section of the country the soldier with his family has gone. They have taken the advance step in the civilization of the West and Southwest and the Northwest, and they are doing their share toward upbuilding the land. Their widows, left in old age and helpless, ought to receive the recognition of this bill and ought to be paid such a sum as would keep them from want. I only regret that we can not to-day say they should receive more than $12 a month, but, of course, these things must come gradually, and that limitation has been fixed for the time being. But, Mr. Speaker, I would go with the committee in saying that the minimum of $12 ought to be raised to at least $20 a month. It would do away in a great measure with private bills. Every Member of Congress has been besieged by his constituents, I take it, to introduce private pension bills. We all know how the requests come; we all know how meritorious many of them are, and we all know how hard it is to turn them down; but we must put a limitation somewhere. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the House has taken this advanced step at this time in doing long-delayed justice to the widows of our soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I thoroughly indorse the bill now pending before the House. I indorse what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HACKNEY] has just said. I had hoped, however, that the bill would be broader in its scope and would have taken within its provisions the few remaining veterans of the Indian wars in Florida, who are as deserving a class of veterans as this Government ever has or ever will pension. But, if I can not receive all for my people that I think they are entitled to, in their name I will accept what the committee desires to give. I want to say also, Mr. Speaker, that I shall never be found upon this floor delaying, obstructing, or opposing any pension bill brought here for the veterans of any war of this Republic. [Applause.]

I desire to yield the remainder of my time, if I may, to my colleague, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this measure. On the contrary, I am in favor of it, and will take great pleasure in voting for it. But, like my colleague from Florida [Mr. CLARK], I regret very much that it is not broader in its scope and has not been so extended as to take in the surviving soldiers of the Florida and other Indian wars, who are now being pensioned. These are a very deserving class of people, and ought to have their pensions increased over the small sum of $8 per month, which they are drawing now, to at least $12, as is provided in this bill for the widows of those who are dead. I am very sorry that this matter comes up here in such a way that we can not offer an amendment to the bill here; but, as I understand it, that can not be done here, and now we will have to take our chances before another committee, the Committee on Pensions, on some other occasion, of introducing and passing a bill through this body that will give relief to this very deserving class of people. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to three minutes.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Speaker, it has been the custom of the sons of men "from time beyond which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary" to celebrate the anniversary of great battles, great soldiers, great statesmen, and great events in their country's history by the erection of monuments of bronze or stone and to inscribe thereon suitable words of commendation or facts of historical importance. But the Congress of the United States for the past forty years have, in addition to the building of monuments, seen fit to provide, under the sanction of law, suitable pensions for the individual soldier and after his death for the widow and minor and helpless children.

This is a commendable thing and, in addition, is but an act of simple justice. Hence it follows that in no sense of the word can the action of the Government be considered as charity. The people of the United States realize that they owe a debt to the soldiers of the civil war that they can never repay, and it follows, I think, that the pittance that in too many instances is doled out to these men, their widows, and their minor and helpless children is not at all commensurate with the services rendered. Right here I desire to repeat the well-known and forceful words of the Master, "The laborer is worthy of his hire." In a Government like ours, that up until the civil war depended for defense not on a standing army, but upon the assurance that if needed her citizen soldiery would be ample for her needs, it is but meet that we should give that soldiery a fraction of the amount that would be necessary to maintain a standing army.

I had no intention of participating in this debate. It would seem that words or arguments in support of this meritorious measure are unnecessary, particularly since the gentlemen from Florida [Mr. CLARK and Mr. SPARKMAN], representing Southern constituencies, have raised their voices in eloquent support of this just cause. But despite that fact I would deem myself deficient in patriotism and wanting in a proper sense of loyalty to a soldier father and his comrades in arms if when the opportunity presented itself I did not rise in my place and add my mite in support of the interests of those women and men who gave so much that yonder flag should remain intact, symbolic of a united country.

Then, again, I have the honor to be a member of the committee that reported this bill, and in justice I must tell you, gentlemen, that this committee labored unceasingly with the end in view of giving to these good women a liberal pension. That this bill is not all that it should be, we concede. That it falls far short of absolute justice between the different classes of soldiers' widows is admitted by all, for under it the woman who married a soldier June 27, 1890, or prior thereto, is on the same footing with the widow who married the soldier before or during the war, and who, of necessity, suffered more of the hardships incident to warfare than did the woman who married the soldier June 27, 1890. We appreciated this fact, and it was the judgment of every member of the committee, Democratic and Republican alike, aye, it was the desire of every member of the committee that the woman who married the soldier during, before, or immediately after the war, should be given $16 per month, but we were not permitted so to do. I say not permitted advisedly. Now, as a matter of course, no pension bill for widows can be made equitable. This for the reason that an arbitrary date must be fixed as well as an arbitrary amount, and any law the essentials of which are arbitrary must necessarily work an injustice to some one.

I myself, Mr. Speaker, and the other Democratic members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were of the opinion that January 1, 1908, should have been the arbitrary date, and in justice I must say that the Republican members of the committee also were of the opinion that January 1, 1908, should be the date fixed by this law; but because of the fact that there might be a deficiency staring us in the face, and in view of the fact that the date in this bill would carry an appropriation of $12,741,300, and this, coupled with other reasons, convinced us we could not go any further, and so the minority joined with the majority in making a unanimous report. I believed that at some future time the arbitrary date of June 27, 1890, should be changed. I am here reminded of the fact that in the case of the widow who had married a soldier since June 27, 1890, there would be no new charge put upon the Government, for in most cases these widows would only receive a small proportion of the pensions their soldier husbands had been receiving from the Government. I am firmly of the opinion that this should be done, and I believe that the temper of the membership of this House is such that this would be changed now but for the fact that under the rule no amendment will be permitted to be offered to this bill. I want to be distinctly understood that the committee were in favor of January 1, 1908, as the arbitrary date, but were deterred from so constructing the bill for the reason that they feared by so doing that they might defeat the whole bill. [Applause.]

In passing I desire to say a word in behalf of a bill I introduced early in the session in the interest of the soldier. This bill, known as "H. R. 9084," while it does not embody my ideas of a perfect pension bill, still I believe it goes at least a step in the right direction. Briefly, it amends the "Act of February 6, 1907," so that a soldier at the age of 62 gets $15 per month; at 70, $20 per month; at 75, $25 per month, and at 80, $30 per month; and after a soldier has once made his proof he is not compelled to furnish new proof when he arrives at an age that entitles him to an increase of pension. I believe that the ideal pension bill would give $1 per day to each and every soldier, and my future efforts shall be directed with that end in view; and I propose to make an honest effort to get a pension for every soldier in my district at the rate of $1 per day through the medium of a special bill if I can not get a general law. We all indulge in flowery talk on occasions of special interest to soldiers. We tell them that they were the bulwark of the country in time of danger; that they preserved the nation; that they made sacrifices without number; that they shattered their health and their fortunes; that they gave of their time when men are laying the foundations of their future prosperity; that, sad to say, many of them gave up their lives; many were wounded and horribly maimed and have since crawled through life as best they could, living evidences of Sherman's truism that "War is hell;" that but for them we would not now be living in a reunited country, the greatest and best that God's sun has ever shone upon. These things and many others of similar import we tell them, and truthfully, but, sad to say, when they knock at the door of Congress and ask that they be given a portion, a small fraction of their due, they are put off with the same old story: "No funds. Wait! Wait! Wait!" Mr. Speaker, these men have waited now until they are in the "sere and yellow leaf." Many of them, yes, hundreds of them, are daily answering the last call, and if more time is permitted to elapse, if adequate relief be not given, and that, too, soon, you will have acted too late to remove from many of "the old guard" the impression that there is truth in the saying that "Republics are ungrateful." [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire if he will, as chairman of the committee, ask unanimous consent that Members may have five days to print on this bill, as there are many gentlemen who desire to be heard.

Mr. SULLOWAY. That is my purpose, I will say to the gentleman. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER.]

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill may pass by unanimous vote of the Members of this House. My only objection to it is that it does not go far enough. The bill which I introduced upon this subject proposed to grant a pension of $12 per month to all widows of soldiers of the civil war and of the war with Mexico who were married prior to the passage and approval of this bill. It was thought by the committee that the expense entailed by this bill was all that Congress would be justified in incurring at the present session. But pension legislation is a matter of growth, and the time will come when a grateful nation will pension all widows of the soldiers of the Union regardless of the date upon which they were married. This bill will add to the cost of the pension roll about $12,000,000 per year. It will benefit over 200,000 worthy widows of deceased soldiers of the civil and other wars. I only regret the amount could not be greater for each one, and that the number benefited might be greater. This nation can well afford to care not only for the nation's defenders, but for those dependent upon them when they have passed from the scenes of earthly action. God bless all the nation's defenders, and let the nation care for those who were dependent upon them. What this great nation owes to its volunteer soldiers of the civil and other wars is beyond computation in dollars. It is a matter of simple justice that the nation should care liberally for them and for their widows and helpless children. The money thus expended does more real good than any other money voted by Congress for any purpose whatever. In the future, no doubt, the policy now inaugurated will be extended so that all deserving ones shall be provided for by act of a grateful Congress.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to register my approval of the bill now before this House for consideration. I had introduced a bill similar to the bill now under consideration, except that my bill goes a little further and proposes to allow widows of the Mexican and Indian wars $12 per month at the age of 62, $16 per month at the age of 70, and $20 per month at the age of 80 years. I did not include widows of the civil war, but I am heartily in favor of this increase and believe it to be right. Members of this House could not do a more commendable act than to pass this measure unanimously. I have numerous bills before the House for increase of pensions of widows of soldiers of all the wars enumerated in this bill, some of these having reached the ripe age of 85 years and who have no other means of support, and it is gratifying that the Committee on Invalid Pensions should take hold of this matter in the manner it has and ask an increase for these most worthy widows of our great soldiers of the Mexican and Indian wars who have long since gone to meet their reward. Mr. Speaker, while I shall vote for this measure, I do sincerely regret that it does not provide for increases according to age as outlined in my bill for widows of Mexican and Indian war soldiers, but I bow to the inevitable and will gladly register my vote of approval of the passage of this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, House bill No. 15653, now under discussion, provides an increase of pension to the widows and minor children of deceased soldiers and sailors of all the wars, beginning with the Mexican and ending with the Spanish-American. The bill provides that widows' pensions shall be raised to $12 per month, instead of $8. The report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions makes the following estimates of number of people affected and the probable cost the first year.

The cost of the bill if enacted into law will approximate $12,741,300 per year, divided as follows, this estimate being based on the number of widows, minor children, and helpless minors on the pension roll on June 30, 1907:

CIVIL WAR.
183,671 widows, minors, and helpless minors, pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, at an increased rate of $48 per year	$8,816,208
2,486 widows pensioned under the general law at $8 per month (act of March 19, 1886), at an increase of $48 per year	119,328
MEXICAN WAR.
6,880 widows, at an increase of $48 per year	330,240
INDIAN WARS.
3,081 widows, at an increase of $48 per year	147,888
REGULAR ESTABLISHMENT.
172 widows, at an increase of $48 per year	8,256
SPANISH WAR.
153 widows, at an increase of $48 per year	7,344
Total	9,429,264

It is estimated that about 18,000 widows may apply for pension under the second section of this bill (having had no prior title by reason of their nondependence under the act of May 9, 1900). The cost of these claims at $144 per year will amount to $2,592,000.

It is further estimated that there will be a yearly increase in the number of widow pensioners (over and above the loss by death) of about 5,000, which would further increase the annual cost to the amount of $720,000, so that the total cost of this bill if enacted into law will amount to about $12,741,000.

The first section of the bill, as above stated, applies to every widow pensioner now on the rolls at $8 per month and includes, therefore, not only the widows of soldiers who served in the civil war, but those who served in the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, the war with Spain, the regular military and naval peace establishment, and one widow of the war of 1812 receiving a pension of $8 only.

The sentiment of the House seems to be unanimously in favor of this deserving but long-delayed act of justice. The committee having charge of the bill have acted wisely and patriotically in unanimously reporting it to the Congress. I am heartily in favor of this measure, and congratulate the country upon its becoming a law. When the nation forgets its heroes and its heroines the beginning of the downfall of our American institutions is at hand.

No people deserve the grateful thanks and the substantial recognition of our citizens more than those who by their valor and patriotism saved the nation. A deep debt of gratitude is due them, and this is especially true of the devoted women whose loved ones fought its battles and won its victories. All good, loyal citizens will rejoice at our action here to-day in passing this just and reasonable measure.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill. I shall vote for it very cheerfully; of course I will. It is doing justice that has been deferred. It is certainly good as far as it goes.

I am of the opinion, however, that if I had the drafting of this bill and the right to determine its scope and extent, I could have improved it in at least three particulars. I say this with all due respect to all the members of this able and honorable committee from which the bill is reported. I have no doubt they have reported the very best bill on which they could agree, and different views must always be considered where it is sought to get substantial results.

First. I believe that the law ought to descriminate in favor of the widow who was the wife of the soldier at the time of his service. Such a widow ought to have $20 per month. She saw and felt the real hardships of the war; she suffered and sacrificed, where the woman who was not married to the soldier at the time of his service did not.

Second. This bill limits the pension to widows of soldiers who were married to the soldier prior to June 27, 1890. This date is purely arbitrary and is not based on any particular reason. The widow of a soldier who married the soldier after that date is not entitled to any pension at all under the terms of this bill. Why not? I am sure many cases may arise and will arise where the marriage occurred after that arbitrary date, in which the facts show more merit than some of those other cases where the marriage occurred before that date.

Perhaps the only reason that anyone can or would suggest for this arbitrary date is that it will limit the amount of the appropriation necessary to pay these additional pensions. If it is not possible for the Government to pay all just pensions, then the hardship ought to be distributed and not fall on a few or a certain class. Many of these widows who married the soldier after June 27, 1890, have the most meritorious claims for pension. Many of them have taken care of the old soldier in his old age, when in ill health, after he had broken down and when he most needed the care and comforts which these widows gave him. I do not think it just to leave these widows unprovided for in this bill. The bill should apply to all widows where the marriage to the soldier took place prior to the passage of this act, and if I could I would amend it in that regard.

Third. The law applies to widows of soldiers who served not less than ninety days. It should apply where the soldier served not less than sixty days.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that under the rule it is not competent to offer amendments to this bill. If it were I would offer each and every one of them, and I believe they would meet with the support of a large majority of the Members of this House. When this bill comes back to us from the Senate I hope these amendments will have been inserted.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, proof that I favor the passage of this bill is found in the fact that I have introduced a bill in this Congress embodying the salient features of the bill now under consideration. I have all along thought that the widows of the soldiers of the war of the rebellion were, in a measure, neglected; that in our anxiety to do the right thing for the soldier we have forgotten the trials, the hardships, and sorrows that were borne by the wife. Even the widow who married after the close of the war and contributed to the support, comfort, and care of the old veteran as he grew older is entitled to a measure of consideration almost commensurate to that of the soldier himself.

We can readily see, when all things are considered, that it was easier for the soldier to fight on the field of battle, surrounded by his comrades and urged on by the fires of patriotism and duty than it was for his wife to remain at home with no protection and surrounded by the lonely scenes common in times of war. The soldier in those days could forget in the excitement of battle and the companionship of his comrades the local surroundings of his old home and the scenes of his home familiar before the war, even though the earth might shake from the thunder of war and the very reflection of the field of battle light up the heavens with a lurid glare akin to the fires that swept the hills of Gehenna, still they could fight; the very force of the battle, the sound of the martial music, and the command of his officer prompted him on to greater deeds of heroism and of glory. The wife of the soldier was left back at home without any of the facilities for immediate knowledge that we have to-day; but few newspapers or letters reached them. They were lonely in a nation where brother was fighting against brother and section warring against section, and in many localities subject not only to the ravages of each contending army, but to the savagery of the bushwacker and guerrilla and all the human fiends who in that dark hour were disposed to take advantage of the war for plunder and pillage.

In East Tennessee, southwest Virginia, and the mountain territory lying along the border line dividing the North from the South, those women left at home were, in my judgment, the highest examples of heroism and true devotion to home and country to be found on the globe or to have lived in the history of the world. The heroism of no Spartan mother was greater than hers.

In East Tennessee, all the men left their homes and went to one army or the other, and the wives of the soldiers were left on the line of the contending armies, yet with a devotion indescribable they stayed in their mountain homes with no other protection than their virtue, their children, and the God they worshipped. They fed all they had to the hungry soldier and the departing refugee, and without a murmur submitted to the conditions of war and came out of this fire with enlarged heroism and devotion to country such as to inspire the admiration of the world. Her lot was more lonely and her hardships far exceeded those of the soldier himself.

Being the son of a soldier who lived in the South and fought three years to preserve this Union, and whose mother at that time suffered all the sorrows, privations, and hardships possible to suffer under all these circumstances, I feel that the widows deserve even more than this bill gives them. The $12,700,000 which this bill proposes to pay to the widows of our soldiers throughout our country will bring joy and gladness into thousands of homes and will make glad many a heart that has yearned through the years of seeming neglect when they reflect on the scenes of forty years ago. Our nation never has before, and perhaps never will again, appropriate money in such a way as to bring as much happiness, comfort, and joy to the American people as this bill as proposed will bring.

It will not be long until the last soldier of the civil war will pass away, and in a short time the last widow of that war will be called hence, but they have enriched our nation with loyalty to country and devotion to home, and from their heroism and patriotism there has come a generation of men and women in whom I believe rests the highest ideas of popular government and in whose hands the destiny of our country will be safe.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHANEY].

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Speaker, I am glad I belong to the one Republic in the world that is not ungrateful to its defenders. We go upon the theory in the United States of having a small standing Army and defending the country in time of need by volunteer soldiers and then paying liberal pensions to them after their services have been rendered to the country. I am glad to hear Members say that they like the principle involved in this bill which is before the House for its consideration, yet there is no general bill that can meet each and every case. It becomes necessary in the course of the business of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that they shall undertake to provide special bills for those cases which can not be included in any general law. There have been a great many private pension bills passed since I have been a Member of this House, but I think there has not been a single one that has not been highly meritorious; and while we regret the necessity for so many of these bills coming before the committee for its consideration and action, yet we can not afford to allow any soldier who served his country faithfully to go "over the hill to the poorhouse." [Applause.]

I hoped, when we passed the bill of last session for the soldiers, giving all soldiers of ninety days' service $12 per month at 62 years of age, $15 per month at 70 years of age, and $20 per month at 75 years of age, that we might also provide $24 to $30 per month for all the totally disabled, so as to relieve the committee of most of the cases which come before the committee seeking relief—and but for the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic it would have been attempted. That committee, however, fearing that the bill might fail altogether, if amendments were made, asked us at this end of the Capitol to pass the bill as it came from the Senate, which was done.

The next needful thing is the passage of a bill providing for the totally disabled soldiers, whether their disabilities are due to their service in the Army or not, and I hope the opportune time for such a measure will not be long delayed. Meantime, we can not afford to allow any of the soldiers to go down in want, and therefore, in order that we may provide for these special cases, special bills are presented and recommended for passage by the committee. I hope the time will come, and I hope to stay in Congress long enough to see every soldier who served his country in the hour of its peril have $1 a day as an honor credit in his old age. [Applause.] This bill provides for all of the widows and gives each one a pension of $12 a month.

The committee did not see wherein there was a difference in her chances of getting on in life between the widow whose husband died of a disease contracted in the service and one whose husband died from some other disability. So we thought we would equalize all of these, and we have done so.

This bill has received the unanimous support of the committee, and it carries quite a sum of money—possibly $13,000,000—and yet not so much but that the Government pocketbook is equal to it—every cent. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEISSE. In the gentleman's remarks he stated that we could not pass a general bill that would take care of a great many of these private pension bills. I believe that we can pass a bill that would take care of many of them.

Mr. CHANEY. Oh no; I say nothing of the sort. We certainly will sooner or later.

Under the act of June 27, 1890, there are 183,671 civil-war widows, minors, and helpless minors getting $8 per month who will get an increase under this bill of $48 per year each, or $8,816,208. There are 2,486 widows pensioned under the general law, at $8 per month also, who will get $4 per month more than they now get, or $48 per year each, equal to $119,328; there are 6,880 Mexican war widows drawing $8 per month who will now get $12, or $330,240; of the Indian wars, there are 3,081 widows getting $8 per month who will now get each $48 per year more, or $147,888; of the Regular Establishment of the Army there are 172 widows who will, under this bill, get $48 per year more each, an aggregate sum of $8,256; there are 153 widows of the Spanish war who will also each get $48 more per year, or $7,344; or an aggregate of $9,429,264.

Widows who have heretofore been denied pensions under the act of 1890 because of an income of $250 per annum will all be pensioned under this bill, and each one will be entitled to $144 per year. There are probably 18,000 of these, and these pensions will amount to $2,592,000. The number of widows are likely to increase something like 5,000, and this will swell the budget to $720,000 more, thus adding a grand aggregate to the pension appropriation of $12,741,000.

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to delay the House in coming to a vote on this benign pension measure. I rise mainly to correct an inaccuracy in a statement that I made a few moments ago, and I correct it by reading a paragraph from a letter of the Commissioner of Pensions, written to myself, and dated January 13, 1908, in which he speaks of a widows' pension law:

> In accordance with your verbal request, I have the honor to advise you that if the pensions of all widows who are receiving a less rate than $12 a month were increased to $12 per month, the increased expenditure per annum would be approximately $9,500,000.

I may add that in the last Congress, and early in the session of this Congress, I introduced a bill substantially like the present one. I think, however, that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. SULLOWAY] and that committee have improved somewhat upon the bill that I offered, and I do not care to add anything in advocacy of this measure except my approval. I might say, Mr. Speaker, of this bill what was said by the great Horace Mann about sixty years ago on the floor of this House when speaking of a measure that was pending to endow institutions for the insane. He said that measure was so fraught with humanity and justice that a pirate in a storm would lay down his tiller to support it. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in the limited time allowed for debate upon the bill now before the House, I desire to say that in my judgment no more righteous measure has been presented for the consideration of this body. Deserving as the veterans of the civil war are of the pensions they now receive, they are scarcely more so than the noble body of women who as wives and mothers have shared with them every privation in peace, and many of them suffered even greater agonies during the war. If the provisions of this bill are enacted into law, as I believe they will be, more than 186,000 widows of the Union Army veterans will receive $12 per month who now receive but $8. Under the law as it stands to-day soldiers' widows are prevented from receiving the $12 because of inability to prove that death resulted from wounds received in battle or from disease contracted in the line of duty while in the service. The soldier may have long been aware of their existence, but in what battle, or campaign, or siege, or under just what conditions of exposure the seeds of death were planted in his system while in the service of his country he is unable to tell. The physician who certifies to cause of death is often perplexed as to the origin of the fatal malady, and even though he may believe that the Army service had much to do with his premature taking off, hesitates, in the absence of more certain knowledge, to certify that the soldier's death resulted from such service. The material needs of the widow who receives $8 are often as great, and may be even greater, than the one who receives $12 per month, while the service rendered by her soldier husband may have been of vastly more value to his country, and in all such cases a very great though unintentional injustice has been done a hero's widow.

When the law was enacted fixing the sum of $8 per month as a widow's pension, that sum was the maximum received by the soldier. Now the minimum allowed the soldier at 62 years of age is $12 a month, regardless of physical or financial condition. Is it any more than simple justice that the maximum rate to the widow should be equal to the minimum rate to the soldier? That is what this bill provides.

There are now with reference to pensions two limitations placed upon widows of civil-war veterans. Under the present law the widow of a soldier having a net income of $250 per year is barred from receiving a pension.

The other limitation is where the marriage to the soldier was contracted after June 27, 1890. The latter barrier still remains if the provisions in the present bill are enacted into law. This limitation, put in the law of June 27, 1890, was designed to act as a deterrent to youngerly women entering into matrimonial relations with men of advanced years, induced thereto by the expectation of a pension in case of the soldier's death. In many instances this law is unjust and works a great hardship, and the day is not far distant when it will be repealed; but, as I understand, under the rules of the House governing during the consideration of the pending measure no amendment will be in order.

The first of the two limitations named as now operative will, if this bill becomes a law, be removed, and the soldier having an honorable service of ninety days or more will entitle his widow, whatever her income, to receive $12 a month. The removal of this limitation puts the wife on an equal footing with her husband as a claimant under the law passed last year and known as the "McCumber Act."

The number who will or may claim under this provision of the bill constitutes the "unknown army" of widows. It is impossible to estimate with any degree of exactness how many there are, but the total number is believed to be comparatively small. This class of cases is said to be the most difficult, the most delicate, and at the same time the most expensive, to adjudicate. While there will be a small minority who may avail themselves of the Government's liberality who could live in ease and comfort and even in luxury without a pension, it still remains that the widow, and there are many, who has only a net income of $250 per year, or $5 per week, or 69 cents per day, finds herself greatly troubled to pay taxes and insurance and betterments, if she has a home, and live on what is left, or if she has no home it is a meager sum with which to pay for shelter and food and clothing and other expenses incidental to every well-regulated life.

The widows of soldiers of the Mexican war, of our Indian wars, and, in a qualified sense, of the Spanish-American war and of the Regular Army, are made to share equally with the wives of the veterans of the civil war in the bounty of the Government.

But, sir, there is another class to whose hearts the passage of this bill will bring a feeling of relief and gladness. That class is composed of the veterans who still survive. Death follows upon their track with relentless and seemingly accelerated force. The mortality roll increases month by month. Time is removing the defenders of the Union more rapidly than all the marches and sieges, the battles and prisons, combined in the bloodiest year of the great war. That mighty host once numbering over twenty-two hundred thousand men and constituting the very flower and strength of American manhood is rapidly vanishing from our sight. In the month of December alone 2,920 were mustered out of the ranks of the heroic living into the ranks of the immortal dead. Sir, that means that there were on the average ninety-seven died every day, four every hour, and one every fifteen minutes of time. This bill crystallized into law will enable many a veteran soldier to gaze for the last time into the face of the wife of his youth and the mother of his children, comforted and sustained by the thought that the Government to which he gave the strength of his young manhood will care for his widow and his helpless orphans.

Sir, before concluding my remarks, I desire to emphasize, not the "inadequacy" of pensions, but rather the unparalleled liberality of the nation toward its defenders and their widows and orphans. As a soldier, I am proud of my country for what she has done and is doing, not only for the soldiers, but for the widows of soldiers. [Applause.] Since I have been a member of this legislative body, I have seen the limit against widows raised from $96 to $250, and now I rejoice to see the limit about to be absolutely removed. Last year a bill passed the Congress which gave to the soldiers of the Union, in addition to what they were then receiving, $20,000,000. If this bill becomes a law, it means in round numbers $13,000,000 more to the widows of soldiers. In other words, the Congress has in the last two years, in addition to that which it was previously appropriating, given $4,000,000 more than the total which France gives to her disabled soldiers and their widows, $9,000,000 more than Germany gives for the same purpose, $20,000,000 more than Austria-Hungary, and $21,000,000 more than Great Britain. I call attention to this here and now that my comrades and my countrymen may know and realize that among the great governments of the world the American Republic stands alone in the unprecedented liberality with which she treats the men who fight her battles and those who are dependent upon them. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I can not yield and comply with the requests for time. How much more time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes and a half remaining.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see this legislation, but I regret very much to learn that this bill does not pension the woman who was once the widow of a deceased Mexican soldier, who afterwards died and she again married and that husband, number two, is now deceased. I hold in my hand a letter received this morning about such a widow, whom I well know, who was the widow of as brave a Mexican soldier as ever drew sword. He died. She was then pensioned, and then after about eight or nine years married a second time and her pension stopped. I am informed from this letter, written by one of the best men in Tennessee, that she is now in "reduced circumstances." That widow, Mr. Speaker, this bill does not aid. I can not see why. There is absolutely no just reason why Congress should not continue to take care of the widows of the heroes of this country who marry a second time and again become widows. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLOWAY. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan says that no nation has been so generous to her defenders as the United States. That is true. No nation has ever had greater reasons for the exercise of such generosity. The pensions which this Government grants to the soldiers of the civil war is not charity. It is the fulfillment of a sacred obligation. It is as binding on the nation's integrity as any portion of the public debt. Since the close of the civil war the Government has paid out in pensions the enormous sum of $3,551,626,000. The total expense of maintaining this Government from its foundation up to the present time is about $20,000,000,000. More than one-sixth of that entire sum has been paid to the soldiers of the civil war. It is estimated that for the fiscal year 1908 it will require $150,000,000 to provide for the pension roll. This great increase over former years is due to the McCumber law, which was approved on the 6th day of February, 1907. The operation of this law has indicated the judgment of its advocates. The annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, shows that 120,355 certificates were issued under the provisions of the McCumber Act. I have made special inquiry of the Department for the six months from June to December, which shows that 161,368 certificates were issued during that period. The total number of soldiers who have been benefited by the provisions of that law will approximate at the present time 300,000. While these figures are extremely gratifying, there is a growing sentiment in Congress and throughout the country in favor of reducing the age limit for a fifteen, twenty, and twenty-five dollar pension. The people of the United States will approve of any plan that will provide the soldiers of the civil war with all the comforts of life during their declining days. I trust the time is not far distant when the men who wore the blue during that mighty conflict shall each receive $1 a day, not as compensation for their patriotic services, for there can be no adequate monetary consideration, but as an expression of the gratitude of the Government and the succeeding generations for their devotion to the cause of human liberty.

Mr. Speaker, I approve of every provision in the pending measure. Lincoln left to us a sacred injunction, "Care for him who shall have borne the heat of the battle and for his widow and his orphan." It is not only the duty of this Congress to provide for the comforts of the soldier, but those dependent upon him should receive the protection of the Government when he is gone. At the present time there are 270,767 widows on the pension rolls of the United States. One hundred and eighty thousand of these are, under the act of June 27, 1890, drawing a pension of $8 per month. The provisions of this measure will increase that pension to $12 per month. I am informed by the chairman of the committee that it will require an expenditure of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 to provide for that increase, but the bill is so eminently fair and just, so thoroughly in accord with the generous policy of this Government in the matter of pensions, that there is not a dissenting opinion on the floor of this House. It meets with unanimous approval here and will have the united support of the country at large. I deeply regret, however, Mr. Speaker, that this measure does not go further and eliminate the clause in the law of 1890 making ineligible to pension widows who have married soldiers since that date. There are thousands of widows throughout the United States who have married soldiers since 1890. They have taken care of these old veterans during their declining days and have made them as peaceful and happy as the passing of the sunlight from the hillside. They can not be charged with other than the highest motives, as they married these soldiers in the face of the fact that they were not entitled to a pension under the law. Many of these noble women are in needy circumstances and should receive the generous treatment which has always been characteristic of the American people. I regret that this measure has been presented under such parliamentary rule as will not admit of its amendment; but, because of the great good that will be accomplished as it now stands, I heartily favor it, and will give it my earnest support. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLOWAY. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE].

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I propose to vote for the passage of this bill; and I have taken the floor simply to call attention to another class of widows whom I regret are not provided for in this bill. I do so at this time in the hope that the Committee on Invalid Pensions will yet report a bill at this session that will provide for the class of widows I have in mind. Under the law as it now stands, and under the law as it will stand if this bill is enacted, the widow of a soldier who was discharged prior to the expiration of ninety days' service on account of wounds, injuries, or disabilities incurred in the service can not obtain a pension unless the widow is able to show that the soldier died as a result of such injuries, wounds, or disabilities. Let me give you a concrete case as an illustration: If a soldier having served sixty days was discharged on account of blindness incurred in the service, while he would be enabled to have a pension during his life, his widow could not obtain any pension unless she was able to show that he died from that specific injury, which obviously would be impossible.

Now I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no reason for this distinction. A soldier who was discharged after sixty or thirty days or any number of days of service because of wounds or disabilities incurred in the service is very properly given a pensionable status, and in my judgment his widow unquestionably should be, equally with the widow of soldier who served ninety days. The discharge of the soldier prior to ninety days of service on account of disabilities incurred therein should give his widow the same rights as the widow of a soldier who served ninety days or more and was honorably discharged, perhaps with no physical disability or injury. The wife of the soldier who was discharged because of disability, even though such discharge was prior to ninety days of service, has been throughout the life of her husband deprived of his earning power and upon his death she is equitably entitled to be included within the provisions of the bill we are now considering. I have a bill now pending before the committee to give such widows a pensionable status and I hope it will be reported to this House. I regret that the bill now under consideration is not subject to amendment. It is an excellent measure as far as it goes. I shall cheerfully support it and trust that in the respect I have mentioned it may later be amended. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The question was taken, and, two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill passed.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members have leave to print on this subject for seven days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that Members may have leave to print upon this bill for seven legislative days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS PEND D'OREILLE RIVER, WASHINGTON.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2929) to authorize the Idaho and Washington Northern Railroad to construct a bridge across the Pend d'Oreille River, in the State of Washington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Idaho and Washington Northern Railroad, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Idaho, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge and approaches thereto across the Pend d'Oreille River, near Newport, in Stevens County, in the State of Washington, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. FRENCH. I understand that it is; yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bridge is to be constructed under the provisions of the general law?

Mr. FRENCH. It has the approval of the War Department.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. FRENCH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ASSIGNMENT OF COMMITTEE ROOMS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present another report from the same committee, to be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois presents another report, and asks that it be printed in the RECORD. Does the gentleman desire to have it printed without reading?

Mr. MANN. I do not object to its being read, but I do not wish to call it up at this time. Perhaps it had better be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The special committee which was directed to report to the House plans for the distribution of rooms in the House Office Building and the redistribution of rooms under the control of the House and Capitol building, beg leave to make a further partial report and to recommend the following resolution, to wit:

"Resolved, That the rooms in the House Office Building bearing the following temporary numbers, according to the plats accompanying H. Res. No. 53, passed by the House December 19, 1907, to wit, 313, 314, and 315, and the large room at the southwest corner of the House Office Building, be, and the same are hereby, assigned for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means, and to the same committee as an additional room for temporary use the room on the House floor of the Capitol building now occupied by the Speaker, and that the rooms now occupied by the Committee on Ways and Means are hereby assigned for the use of the Speaker."

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman when he proposes to call up that resolution?

Mr. MANN. Not this morning. The gentleman will have notice of it. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

GOLDFIELD, NEV., LABOR TROUBLES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Labor:

The House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State with copies of papers called for by the resolution of the House of Representatives on January 22, 1908, reading as follows:

"Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the interests of the public service, a copy of the report made to him by the special commission, composed of Lawrence O. Murray, Herbert Knox Smith, and Charles P. Neill, sent by him to Goldfield, Nev., for the purpose of investigating the labor troubles in that district and to make a report concerning the same; and also such other papers relating thereto as in his judgment are material and for the better information of the House."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 3, 1908.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. PERKINS in the chair.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES].

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced in the House and had referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, recognizing the constant allegiance of the Polanders in America to the Government of their adoption, we therefore extend our sympathy and good wishes toward the Poles in Prussia in their efforts to maintain their property rights in that Kingdom.

Mr. BATES. I also ask to have the telegram read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ERIE, PA., February 3, 1908.

Hon. ARTHUR L. BATES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

We are delighted with your attitude on the Polish question.

EMORY A. WALLING.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, the telegram which was just read was from Emory A. Walling, who is serving by unanimous election a second term of ten years as presiding judge over the courts of Erie County, Pa. It is but expressive of the opinions which are being voiced and sounded in public meetings all over this land in protest against what appears to be the oppressive attitude of Prussia againt the Poles in Prussia.

Public meetings are being held throughout this country protesting against the acts of what, if newspaper accounts and speeches of leading scholars and judges and ministers are true, is the oppressive attitude of the Prussian Government against the Poles who are endeavoring to live peaceably in their native land. It comes to us that they have by edict prohibited the use of the Polish language in their own schools; that they have by edict prohibited the use of their native tongue in any public meetings, and that now they propose to pass in the Prussian Parliament a resolution for the creation of a commission which is to be a commission of "compulsory dispossession," to take up and condemn the homes of Polanders, paying for them the price that this commission see fit to pay, and settle their own people in the homes of these distressed people, who have occupied that land, they and their fathers, for the past two thousand years. This is in contravention of the Congress of Vienna of 1815, and in violation of the organic law of Prussia, which prohibits the Government from making distinction between the citizens of the Kingdom.

The effect of this will be to stamp out the Polish nation and efface its name and history. This brave and heroic people have always excited the admiration of mankind.

We recognize the loyalty and devotion of the Poles in America to us and to our institutions, and it runs back to our Revolutionary war, when Kosciusko and other brave men joined our cause and won renown on American battlefields. This feeling of gratitude and the common instincts of humanity have caused expressions of sympathy to be voiced by the American people. It is as though the men of a century ago, who faced death in freedom's cause, and that freedom—American freedom—were inspiring the men of to-day to be moved by this cry of oppression. [Applause.]

Mr. HINSHAW. I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise at this time for the purpose of defending the present Administration. It needs no defense with the American people. Its record will illume the pages of United States history and mark an epoch in popular government. To it the student of the future will point as the period when the people came into the possession of their own by establishing as facts the theretofore theories of a Republic where by legislation and administration it was declared that special interests must not prevail when in conflict with the common good, and that Federal law is enacted for no class or financial condition, but for the people. Not the rich people; not the poor people; not the great; not the small; not the white; not the black, but all of the people, rich and poor, great and small, white and black.

Some of the steps taken have by a few been claimed as being on new and dangerous grounds, and from the beginning of the Fifty-eighth Congress until now these gentlemen and interests have insisted that a departure from the principles of the Republic has been made and that industrial and commercial confusion and depression must be, and are, the results. The legislation of the last two Congresses has been charged with having produced the late financial disturbance, and especially has the rate legislation, as consummated by the act of June 29, 1906, been blamed for the conditions of November and December, 1907.

There are other gentlemen, Democratic politicians, who, recognizing the fact that the people have pronounced the legislation good, desire to appropriate it to themselves as capital to be used as a political asset in future campaigns.

It is my purpose, during the brief time that I shall ask the indulgence of the House, to call attention to some facts which to me seem conclusive of the various claims and charges made so recklessly and so regardlessly of the elements of logic and truth.

It is a conceded fact that the material prosperity of the country during the last ten years has been beyond the wildest dream of the most optimistic; indeed it has been almost dangerous in its magnitude. This very development brought into prominence certain great evils, which had never been other than evil, but which had been tolerated theretofore. In dealing with these conditions no new law principle was invoked, but the old common law was applied through effective instrumentalities. In spite of existing law, gross favoritism was shown by the public carriers to some of the people. The means for enforcing just and reasonable rates and provisions were inadequate, in fact, beyond the reach of the injured citizen. He appealed to the Fifty-ninth Congress; it listened to his appeal and wrote a new statute reviving an old law and clothing it with the power to do, as well as to advise. No line of that law was written in the spirit of malice or revenge; no sentence was inspired by a desire to deal unjustly with any interest to be affected by it. On the contrary, it was publicly stated on this floor by the advocates of the measure that it was in the interest of the honest railroad and would inure to its benefit as well as to the benefit of the people at large. Honest railroading and general prosperity go hand in hand. It is not a worthy argument against a law to prove that the criminal offender, he who hopes to practice his nefarious schemes, will be panic-stricken before that law. [Applause.] The question is, How is legitimate enterprise affected by it? It is not my intention to explain in detail my theory of how the so-called "panic" was caused. It is my aim to show that railroad legislation and enforcement of the law did not deter any honest man from contributing to the prosperity of the country.

He who reads the law of 1906 will find no section of it imposing a single provision upon common carriers which the very spirit of their charters did not contemplate. They never had a right to impose other than just and reasonable rates and regulations; they never had a right to discriminate. In fact, they denied that their rates and regulations were unjust and unreasonable, and protested that no discriminations were practiced except such discriminations as strong and powerful shippers forced upon them, and which they were anxious the Congress should relieve them from. They admitted that the pass evil had become a burden to them, and relief was welcomed in that particular. The record of the old Interstate Commerce Commission showed no cause for fear, and the courts were ever open to hear and adjust any and all injustices which a future commission might possibly inflict. The carriers did not think that wrong or injury was to be inflicted upon them. This is proven by the fact that the passage of the so-called "Esch-Townsend bill" in February, 1905, did not affect railroad stocks or railroad enterprises. In spite of the fact that it was known that railroad legislation was sure to be enacted at the next session of Congress, the House and President being determined in the matter, still railroad extensions were unchecked and investments in new railroad equipment were unparalleled. The passage of the law of 1906 did not halt this mighty movement; stocks, instead of going down, continued to rise. The new Commission entered upon its work. No railroad manager raised his voice against the action of the Commission. It confiscated no earnings or profits. In the winter of 1906 and 1907 and in the spring and summer of 1907 political controversies between the President and certain so-called great captains of industry occurred. A general demand for the renomination of President Roosevelt was being manifested. These captains got busy and prophets of disaster were abroad in the land. They did not represent the sentiments of men afraid of their investments, for none were afraid. The widows and orphans for whom the hearts of stock gamblers bleed had not learned that there was anything to fear. The Commission had made no general reductions of rates; every car of every railroad was in commission 365 days in the year. The earnings of the roads were never so great. Shippers who had been receiving special rates were paying the same as others. Those who had been riding for nothing were paying the regular fare. There was no cause for fear; there was no fear, and he who claims that rate legislation caused the panic or to any considerable extent legitimately contributed to it, but begs the question in his desire to justify his opposition to the measure and to discredit an Administration hostile to special interests and favorable to government by law.

For more than a year the law has been administered and during that time no one, save those whose wish was father to the thought, has claimed that the effects of that law have been detrimental to honestly conducted railroading. Some criminals were brought to justice and others were at least exposed to arrest, but railroad earnings grew no less. In October and November last the banks in the city of New York, the clearing banks for the country, were raided. Millions of dollars were withdrawn from legitimate business and withheld from enterprise. These banks could not respond to the demand of their depositors, the country banks, and these latter commenced to hoard their deposits in self-protection against a "run" and business depression was the result. If gentlemen mean that because some men who saw that the rate law itself could not disturb business, but rather would make it more stable and therefore more desirable, were still intent on discrediting it and the Administration which fathered it; if they mean that these men, a few of them, became worse than the vilest burglar who ever blew a safe or used a jimmy, worse than the highwayman who in the pistol's glare puts out life and steals the purse—became worse than these, and tapped the arteries of the financial system and drew out sufficient of the circulating medium to threaten commercial life with stagnation and death, then I can see some logic in their contention. But these logicians say that these financiers would not ruin themselves to vent their spite. Certainly not. Has anyone heard of the ruin of one of them? Their stocks have gone down, but they hold them still, and with the money they have withdrawn from circulation they can and will profit by the necessities of the less fortunate. In the end these men will be found smiling and serene in the structure which they have reared on the ruins of others. But let me say to those gentlemen that the country is not deceived, and if it ever becomes a question as to whether we shall have great prosperity by the grace of malefactors, or less prosperity under honest and impartial law, the people have already accepted the latter and the struggle will be over before it is fairly begun. [Applause.]

I am no agitator, nor do I believe, as a general proposition, in laws designed to make people good, but I do believe in common decency; I do have faith in a government of law. Such a government proclaims what by common consent is believed to be just and prohibits what by the same authority is believed to be unwise.

Now, I am in favor of enforcing the penalty imposed by the law against every offender, and I would make the penalty fit the offense, where it does not already. In the end, law enforcement against offenders means wider liberty, greater security, and more enduring prosperity. If we have reached that point, and I deny that we have, when the conscienceless powerful must be left alone in order to avert even a general panic, I believe I speak the honest and thoughtful sentiment of a great majority of the American people when I say, Let our present business system fall, and on the ruins from our great natural resources and with our patriotic citizens of all classes, unhampered and unfettered by the powerful vicious, we will lay deep and strong the foundaton of an industrial edifice which can not be rocked by men who profit by the losses of others and thrive on threats of destruction. But I believe our present industrial and commercial condition is secure; its enemies have overestimated their strength. They will learn ere long—yea, they are learning already—that the way of the transgressor is hard, and he who tries to block the wheels of justice will be ground beneath them.

The agitation attending the passage of the interstate-commerce act of 1906 has passed. That act has been the law of the land for something over a year, not long enough to test its every provision or to perfect the machinery for its complete administration, but under the circumstances, perhaps, it has been long enough to demonstrate whether it is an instrument of justice, beneficial to the people, or a means of oppression inimical to the common good and disastrous to general prosperity, the handiwork of statesmen, or the blunder of demagogues and foolish men. Since before its enactment to the present time it has been subjected to attack by trained and skillful critics. It has had bitter and powerful enemies earnestly and industriously intent on discrediting it. I say, therefore, that under the circumstances it has been a law long enough to demonstrate in a measure, at least, whether it has been worth while. It will be well for us in considering this question to bear in mind that up to the legislation of the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Congresses most of the attempts at railroad legislation had been to prevent discriminations between shippers and between places. Certain it is that the act of 1887, under the construction of the Supreme Court, was directed to that end; and yet discriminations increased, and in 1906 they were generally recognized as stupendous evils. Some of the old methods of granting rebates had ceased, but new and more invidious, and therefore more dangerous, means were employed. To-day it is the universal opinion of shippers and others that rebates have practically ceased. There may be some cases yet in existence, but they are accompanied by as much danger to the giver and receiver as are the crimes of theft and burglary to the perpetrators of those offenses. This condition is due almost entirely, I believe, to the act of June 29, 1906. It increased the penalties somewhat for violations, though not as much as I would have liked, for I would have imposed imprisonment more frequently; but, best of all, it made detection easier.

It is true that we had the Elkins law, a statute against rebates, but under it the offenses were not stopped. The act of 1906 did more than increase penalties and provide means for detecting offenders. It did what, may I be pardoned for saying, I prophesied it would do when the bill was before this House, namely, serve notice upon the carriers that the time had come when they must respect and obey the law. This notice, I submit, did much to bring relief from the intolerable rebate system. Respect for the law is more potent than the law itself.

But, as I have stated, sentiment was not the sole virtue of this legislation. The criminal provisions were in effect practically the same as under then existing law, but the Commission was empowered to fix a rate. It could with reason find in many cases that the special rate was the reasonable one and declare it so; this of itself was a powerful reason against granting rebates. The act provided that railroad accounts should be uniform and that the books of the companies should be subject to inspection by experts employed for that purpose. Under this inspection it would be very difficult to pay rebates without having the same detected. Entries would appear under some name or designation; several employees would have to be parties to the entries. Such employees would hesitate to commit a crime which would subject them to imprisonment, and the more parties necessary to the offense, the greater the danger of detection. The law was passed in 1906. Since then we have seldom heard of rebates. Is it illogical to claim that the act put an end to rebates?

The one provision of the new law which received the most bitter opposition was the section which gave the Commission power to fix a reasonable rate as the maximum in place of the one found unreasonable. Experience under the law fully justifies the action of the Congress in inserting it in the statute. It furnishes the only means for obtaining just and reasonable rates, and I hope to show before I sit down some of the great benefits which have actually been brought to the people thus far through the administration of this provision. It is true that some of the carriers have seen fit, as usual, to evade the effects of this statute by indirection, but they can not go entirely beyond its reach. For several years carriers have been raising rates, insisting that they had a right to share in the general prosperity of the country. This is an unfortunate statement of their rights. Under existing law as construed by the courts the common carrier is entitled to impose a freight charge which will yield a reasonable return upon its investment after meeting the necessary expenses of maintenance, operation, and extension, but it is entitled to nothing more. It imposes and demands this when times are hard. Should it not be subject to the same rule when times are good?

I believe that the enforcement of the law against rebates and other forms of favoritism has made it possible for the carriers to make more money at the old rates than ever before, and certainly it is the common belief that net earnings since 1898 have been sufficient to demonstrate the fact that a reasonable return to railroads has been more than realized. Representatives of the carriers insisted before the committees of Congress that anything like a general raise of rates was impossible. This statement was made in the face of the fact that rates were being raised at that time and have been raised since and without any reason other than that the traffic would stand it. But how can it be said that the new law caused this rise in rates? And if it did, can it be seriously urged that it has been detrimental to the railroads and the cause of the panic? There is absolutely no provision of the law which encourages the raising of rates. On the contrary, it furnishes the only relief against unjustly high rates, and if charges have been increased with the knowledge that upon complaint and hearing they may be reduced and reparation to the shipper made, what would have taken place under the old law? So far as the right to advance charges is concerned, no change was made by the act of 1906 further than to require a thirty days' notice of a change of rate.

And now may I call your attention to some of the things that have been actually done by the Commission since the act of 1906 went into effect? There were filed during the year from December 1, 1906, to December 1, 1907, 415 formal complaints alleging various violations of the act to regulate commerce. There were 82 similar complaints filed during the year 1906 and 350 during the six years prior to the passage of the Hepburn bill.

Of the 415 complaints filed the Commission has heard and investigated 276, and of this number it has decided and made final reports on 126, all of which were contested and resulted in final orders. Fully 30 more are awaiting briefs, statistics, and various information asked for by the Commission, which is necessary before final orders can be made. Counsel for both complainants and defendants have delayed in many instances the issuance of final orders. After full hearing and investigation by the Commission, and upon arguments and briefs submitted by the various parties to the actions, final orders were issued as follows: In 65 final orders were issued against various defendant railroads, in 46 the complaints were dismissed, and in 15 no final orders were issued, due to the fact that both parties signified their intention to adjust their differences.

In 14 complaints in which issues were joined by both complainants and defendants the petitions were dismissed at the request of the petitioners on the ground that the defendants had granted the relief asked for by the petitioners. Of the 126 reported decisions by the Commission 78 involved the reasonableness of the rates, 32 involved discriminations of various kinds, 13 involved reparation claims, and 20 involved the establishment of through rates. It will be seen that some of the above-decided cases involved more than one issue; that is to say, a given case may have involved the reasonableness of a rate as well as a discrimination of some sort, etc.

In all there were 5,156 matters handled by the Commission. Of these 4,382 were informal in character, and of this number 2,106 were returned to the complainants on account of the Commission not having jurisdiction over the matters complained of. There were 2,276 informal complaints handled, which resulted in the satisfactory adjustment of something over 1,000 cases. In 660 cases refunds were permitted on orders issued by the Commission on account of overcharges made by the railroads. In 60 cases the rates were reduced by the railroads on account of correspondence conducted by the Commission, calling the attention of the railroads to the unreasonableness of certain rates complained of. The remaining cases resulted in the filing of formal complaints or were otherwise disposed of.

Thus far only one final order of the Commission has been appealed from, viz, the Preston & Davis case, which was brought against the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company, in which the Commission ordered the defendants to reestablish its facilities for unloading petroleum from tank cars at Clymer street, at its Brooklyn terminal, so that the complainants could be served there as formerly. The defendants appealed the case to the United States circuit court of the southern district of New York, in which court the order of the Commission was sustained. Up to the present time no further appeal has been made by the defendants of this case.

I have caused to be examined the records of the 50 cases which are discussed in the annual report of the Commission now submitted to Congress and find that of this number 40 attack the reasonableness of rates which were filed with this Commission prior to the passage of the Hepburn bill, 5 attack the reasonableness of rates which were filed since the passage of said bill, and in 3 of them some of the rates attacked were filed prior and some subsequent to the passage of the bill. In one of them the tariff complained of was not filed with the Commission at all. There are now 305 cases pending before the Commission, 198 of which are ready for trial. About 80 per cent of these cases deal with the reasonableness of the rate. Thus, it will be seen that the law has demonstrated the wisdom of its advocates. Rates in 60 out of 78 complaints were found unreasonable and reduced. In many more cases rates were reduced voluntarily by the carriers when complaints were threatened. Would this have been done had not the Commission been given power to administer justice in these matters?

There is one defect in the law which, by proposed amendment, I have sought to cure. The law provides that by giving a thirty days' notice the carrier may raise its rates. If at the end of the thirty days and after the new rate goes into effect it is found unreasonable, then complaint can be made and the rate may be reduced; but in the meanwhile business may have been injured, shipping contracts may have been disturbed, and great wrong may have been inflicted. The amendment proposes to give shippers the right to complain of the proposed rate at the time notice of a raise is given. Then the question of reasonableness can be determined before irreparable injury has been effected, and that without any injustice to carrier or shipper. [Applause.] With this amendment freight rates can be made just and reasonable. Every protection against an unlawful advance in charges should be given by law.

Since I have been in Congress I have seen demonstrated the fact that patriotism and exalted statesmanship have no party labels. [Applause.] I have seen the minority in this House at times strain truth and propriety almost to the breaking in its desperate attempts to acquire partisan advantage. I have no doubt the Republicans did practically the same things when they were in the minority. It is really surprising what great and good things a man or party out of power would do if in power. The surprise is only equaled by the paucity of things done when opportunity presents itself. [Laughter.] I said on this floor, in discussing the rate bill at the time it was up for consideration, that it was nonpartisan, and I gave credit for its passage to Democrats and Republicans alike. I was naturally glad that its passage was brought about under a Republican Congress. In fact, it is very gratifying to contemplate the fact that all positive, progressive, beneficial legislation during the last forty-five years has been under a Republican Administration. Democrats have voted for these measures at times after they have talked against them and exhausted the realm of criticism and opposition. And criticism and opposition are not altogether useless. The minority has helped. I believe it has rendered real service to the country during the last four years. It has a nose for carrion. It can scent corruption at very long range, but it has no refined distinction as to the kind. It will rally its members as gleefully to the carcass of a mouse as to that of an elephant, and I have sometimes thought its olfactories were so abnormally developed that they were dulled to all sweet things, and in breathing the miasma of death they failed to detect the odor of life. [Laugher on the Republican side.]

It does not require great ability to find fault with conditions, but it sometimes does require great ability to remedy those conditions; and yet fault-finding is necessary and is the largest part of the capital of a minority. I have little complaint to make at much of the criticism of our minority brothers. It is true that a great amount of that criticism has been captious and unreasonable, but reason was not expected, and in the end, after the record for home consumption has been completed, the minority has voted right on most of all the great questions before the Congress.

Every little while I hear some Democrat say, or read of his saying, that the rate bill, the antitrust law, and the enforcement of them are of Democratic origin; that Republicans have stolen Democratic thunder; that President Roosevelt, to use a classical expression of Mr. Bryan, has been wearing the latter's clothes. Ordinarily I think it is wise not to notice these things; but the statements have been made so long and so loud that it is possible some of the younger generation may believe them, and the Democratic party may come to claim them by right of possession under the statute of limitations. I shall make the claim hostile and shall dispute that either the rate bill or the Sherman antitrust law is Democratic.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the gentleman remember in the Fifty-ninth Congress a speech made by Mr. Sibley, of Pennsylvania, a Republican, in which he said that the Democrats were responsible for the rate regulation?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, I believe Mr. Sibley was opposed to it, and he evidently wished to make it as obnoxious to the House as possible; but neither Mr. Sibley nor anybody else will dispute the history of railroad legislation when I have presented it to the House, for fortunately we have a record of all Congressional matters, and to it we can turn for facts when disputes are on.

The history of American interstate and foreign commerce would fill a volume. Indeed, it is the story of our growth and development as a nation.

The fathers who framed the fundamental law of our land provided Congress with power "To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." Upon that provision "hang all the law and the prophets" so far as Federal control over common carriers and corporations is concerned. When that provision was adopted interstate commerce was in its infancy. In comparison with what exists to-day it was an almost negligible quantity. Up until the middle of the nineteenth century the efforts of State and nation were devoted to devising ways and means for extending commerce; little attention was paid to regulation of carriers. Indeed, as early as the sixties the Government was donating lands and money for building railroads. The Government was exceedingly, may I say excessively, grateful to the men who organized themselves into companies for the purpose, under sanction of general or special law, of performing for hire a function of government; and by such indulgence it neglected to establish rules of conduct which might easily have been enacted into law as a condition of engaging in the common carriage of interstate commerce, but which were strongly opposed and found extremely difficult of passage when proposed for the correction of established evils. Two classes of railroad men came into being—those who builded railroads, like the Vanderbilts, and those who wrecked them, like the Goulds and Harrimans. Railroads affected by the latter class were handled on Wall street through the manipulations of stock gamblers who had no more concern for the interests of those people who bought stocks as an investment than they had for the people whom the roads, in theory, at least, were supposed to serve. Productive energy was extending mightily the field of manufactures and general industry. Favoritism to special interests and places was shown and rates were fixed without regard to justice or reason.

As the railroads of the country increased in wealth and influence, less regard was paid to the rights and duties which they owed the people. Discontent was being manifested throughout the country and efforts to secure relief through the States were unavailing. Even before the close of the civil war there was a growing tendency to demand of the Federal Government some relief from the manifest evils of transportation.

The first real movement to regulate commerce by railway on the part of the National Government was in 1865, when Charles Sumner, a Republican Senator from Massachusetts, introduced in the Senate of the United States a bill to regulate commerce among the States, but the only recorded action on the bill was its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

In December, 1865, James A. Garfield, a Republican Congressman from Ohio, introduced in the House of Representatives a bill to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communications among the States. This bill became the first law asserting the power of the Federal Government over interstate commerce on June 15, 1866. On January 7, 1868, Garrett Davis, a Whig Senator from Kentucky, moved in the Senate that the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of regulating interstate railroads in the matter of rates of fare, freight, etc., and on March 3, 1868, William Loughridge, a Republican Congressman from Iowa, offered a resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the power of the Congress to regulate freight rates charged by railroads engaged in interstate commerce. On April 27, 1868, Godlove S. Orth, a Republican Congressman from Indiana, moved that the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire whether Congress had power to regulate railroads extending through more than one State in such a manner as to secure: (a) Safety of passengers; (b) uniform and equitable rates of fare; (c) uniform and equitable charges for freight or transportation of property; (d) proper connection with other roads as to the transportation of passengers and freight, and if, in the opinion of the committee, Congress possessed such power, to report a bill which would secure the objects mentioned. A report on this resolution was made to the House on June 9, 1868, and is remarkable for the strong ground it took in favor of the widest interpretation of the powers of Congress to regulate commerce in all the particulars set forth in the resolution; but the committee did not present a bill, for the reason, it said, that it did not have the information to enable it to proceed intelligently. Petitions began to pour into Congress from every direction praying for relief from various specified evils. In December, 1869, William Williams, a Republican Congressman from Indiana, introduced a resolution in the House instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the powers of Congress to enact laws to protect the great agricultural and other interests of the West by securing lower railroad rates.

In 1872 U. S. Grant, a Republican President of the United States, for the first time in the history of the country called the attention of the Congress in a message to the fact that it would be called upon at that session to consider certain means for the cheaper and more certain transportation of products of the South and West to the Atlantic seaboard, and recommended that a committee be appointed to obtain necessary information for the enactment of suitable legislation to insure just and equitable transportation. In compliance with this recommendation a Republican Senate appointed a committee with William Windom, a Republican Senator, as chairman on December 16, 1872, and this committee was instructed to sit during the recess of the Senate. The principal question before this committee was cheaper transportation rather than the abuse of railroad management. Yet the committee investigated all phases of the railroad problem, and its report was the first real comprehensive plan for railroad control by the Federal Government. Upon reading that report gentlemen will find that it is, in many respects, a prophecy of the law of 1906. It is more radical in some respects, and while it does not provide for a commission, it does suggest a bureau of commerce, a forerunner of a rate-fixing commission.

The first bill introduced into Congress seeking to regulate interstate commerce by railroads and providing for a commission was by George W. McCrary, a Republican Congressman from Iowa. It was a drastic measure of fourteen sections and required the commission to fix schedules of reasonable maximum rates on all interstate railroads. It passed a Republican House in March, 1874, but failed in the Senate. At the same session of Congress John Sherman, a Republican Senator from Ohio, introduced a Senate bill prohibiting and declaring unlawful unjust discriminations, providing for publishing all rates, and making departures therefrom illegal. In 1876 James H. Hopkins, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill similar to the one presented by Senator Sherman. Mr. Hopkins is the first Democrat I find of record to take a positive step in the direction of railroad legislation, although, as we have seen, he had many distinguished Republican examples to follow.

In 1878 Judge Reagan, a Democratic Congressman from Texas, introduced a bill in the House to regulate commerce among the States and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers, but it contained no provisions for a commission. His remedies for wrongs were suits in the courts for forfeitures. In 1885 Mr. CULLOM, a Republican Senator from Illinois, introduced a bill in the Senate providing for regulation of common carriers through a commission and permitted pooling of railroads under the commission's direction. At the same session Congressman Reagan introduced a bill in the House similar to the one he had theretofore introduced. It prohibited pooling and did not provide for a commission. This bill passed the House, which was Democratic. The Cullom bill passed the Republican Senate. These bills were in some respects similar. The Reagan bill contained provisions intended to do away with discriminations between individuals and places, secure publicity, etc., and then left the private shippers to fight it out with the corporations in the ordinary courts of law. The Cullom bill contained similar provisions, but provided for the establishment of a commission whose business it would be to supervise the execution of the law, listen to complaints of shippers, investigate charges against offending railroads, and assist the shippers in obtaining relief. After a long and thorough discussion a compromise between the two Houses was reached, and what is known as the Cullom Act, or the law of 1887, was passed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a couple of questions.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One of them is, Is not the Reagan bill, which the gentleman has just referred to, the real foundation of all legislation that has taken place since?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would say that I have stated the facts as they are, and if I have, the Reagan bill was not the pioneer——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I didn't ask the gentleman whether it was the pioneer; I asked if it was not the foundation of all the legislation enacted since.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think so; certainly not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, the second question I want to ask the gentleman is, Is not Senator CULLOM one of the statesmen who has been here a long time that has the trick of getting his name fastened on somebody else's bill pretty frequently? [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not prepared to state that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There have been four or five such gentlemen around here. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee rose.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would like to complete my answer to the gentleman from Missouri. I would say that the Reagan bill simply prohibited discrimination, and it left every man who was injured to his remedies under the law. He had to go into court. That is not the foundation of modern legislation. The foundation principle of modern legislation is that which provides for a commission whose duty it shall be to care for the rights of those individuals, who are incapable of presenting them themselves, and to secure justice in the courts. Mr. Reagan was opposed to that feature, and it was under such opposition that it was forced into conference. Mr. Reagan opposed the pooling proposition in the Cullom Act, and that went out in the conference report. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that the Reagan bill passed a Democratic House, went to the Senate and was killed in the Senate?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; the last time it did not. I know that in 1878 it was introduced, and in 1885 it did pass the House and went over to the Senate, where it met the Cullom bill, which had passed that body, and the two went into conference.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think the gentleman will find several Reagan bills passed several times the Democratic House and went to the Senate and were defeated, and then the House Reagan bill, the last one, came to the Senate and met the Cullom bill, and the two bills became the law of 1887.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to say that there is not a principle in the Reagan bill which is incorporated in modern legislation that was not several times prior to his presenting it introduced in this House by the gentlemen whose names I have mentioned here. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GREGG. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. GREGG. Is the gentleman informed as to when Judge Reagan first introduced a bill embodying the principles of the bill that was finally passed?

Mr. TOWNSEND. He never introduced such a bill.

Mr. GREGG. I do not mean the main features, but regulating interstate commerce.

Mr. TOWNSEND. He introduced a bill in 1878. It was preceded by the Garfield bill, the Davis resolution, the Loughridge resolution, the Orth resolution, President Grant's message, the Windom report, the McCrary bill, and the Sherman bill. Mr. Reagan had seen similar measures time and time again. Mr. Hopkins, a Democrat of Pennsylvania, was ahead of Mr. Reagan.

Mr. GREGG. Doesn't the gentleman know that Mr. Reagan first introduced a bill in 1878?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have said so.

Mr. GREGG. Did he not work on it every session from then on until it culminated in a compromise known as the Cullom bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certain features he had introduced, which were copied from many other earlier bills on that subject preventing discrimination.

Mr. GREGG. My question is, Did not his efforts in that direction culminate in the final adoption of the bill known as the Cullom bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, there was no doubt but what his efforts compromised the Cullom Act, if that is what the gentleman means; it undoubtedly compromised the Cullom Act, which enabled it to pass.

Mr. GREGG. Has not the gentleman got it backward? Did not the Cullom Act compromise the Reagan Act?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, no, I think not. At least I have stated the record, and gentlemen will have an opportunity to review my remarks and see if I have quoted the history of the railroad rate legislation correctly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many times did a railroad regulating bill pass the Senate and come to the House before the Cullom Act passed? How many railroad regulating bills passed the American Senate before the Cullom Act passed?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There was no railroad rate regulation bill. There were several resolutions and bills introduced.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. When did the gentleman say the first bill was introduced—1860?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. From that time up to 1887 the Republican party had control of the Senate. Why is it that they were so long in getting the bill through the Senate?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will try and answer the gentleman's question in a moment. Mr. Chairman, I now want to proceed to the conclusion——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. How much more time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. Six minutes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can not yield unless I am granted more time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman but a moment. What does the gentleman consider, after the decision of the maximum rate case by the Supreme Court of the United States, was the greatest obstacle in the enforcement of the law against railroads in the matter of collecting unreasonable rates? I know that the gentleman must believe that it was the reckless use of the power of temporary restraining orders and injunctions by the courts. I quite concur with the gentleman in his praise of the principles of the present rate law. I am not much disposed to amend that law unless it can be shown that the law is working manifest injury. I want to call his attention to one part of that law. The gentleman has said that the rate law is a Republican measure. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, I will have to say to the gentleman that I can not allow him to make a speech in my time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But I am not going to make a speech.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But the gentleman has taken half of my time already.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask the gentleman this: Who was responsible for this part of the law:

Provided, That no injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the Commission shall be granted, except on hearing after not less than five days' notice to the Commission.

Is it not a fact that every Republican on the Interstate Commerce Committee opposed that paragraph, and it is not of Democratic origin, put there by Democrats?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can not say whether the resolution was presented seriously by any Democrat or not. I know I have never opposed the principle of notice of hearing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I say that it is.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I say to you that any man would be a fit candidate for an insane asylum who would attempt to follow out all of the suggestions that have been made by gentlemen on that side with reference to railroad legislation. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] The trouble with the law of 1887 was that under the decision of the Supreme Court in the maximum-rate case it was devitalized of all power. Now, Mr. Chairman, I must finish my remarks.

Mr. RUCKER rose.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, let me finish, and then I will stand here and answer all the questions the gentlemen may desire to put.

Mr. RUCKER. But I desire to ask one question which will not take a minute.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, let it go.

Mr. RUCKER. As I understand the matter, the gentleman has stated that for about thirty-five years prominent Republicans have been introducing and striving to enact a railroad-rate act. I would like to ask the gentleman how it happens that with both Houses largely in the control of the Republican party they have never been able to get such a measure enacted into law until its management was turned over to a Democrat in the Senate? [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I deny that the turning over of the bill to a Democrat in the Senate had anything to do with the passing of it, and I never heard that argument used before. Such action was taken to defeat the passage of the bill. I am not saying that the railroad-rate legislation was enacted as early as it ought to have been enacted. I am simply answering the argument that railroad-rate legislation is of Democratic origin. When the Democratic party was in full power it did nothing in the matter. And in further answer to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], allow me to say that the Republicans did not have the Senate from '65 to '87, the Democrats had a majority from '77 to '83. The Garfield bill passed the Senate, as I have stated, in 1866. The Senate appointed the Windom Commission in 1872, and its report, in 1873, gave the Congress and the country the most comprehensive understanding of the railroad question in its relations to the Government it had obtained up to that time.

I submit that the Commission and the country believed that the act of 1887 gave the Commission power to fix a reasonable maximum rate; but after ten years the Supreme Court decided that the Commission did not have such power under the law. Agitation for further regulation was revived, and in 1902 Mr. ELKINS, a Republican Senator from West Virginia, introduced in the United States Senate a bill prohibiting rebates; this became a law February 19, 1903. In the Fifty-eighth Congress Mr. TOWNSEND, a Republican Congressman from Michigan, introduced in the House of Representatives a bill which was a combination of two bills, one introduced by himself and the other by Mr. ESCH, a Republican Congressman from Wisconsin. This bill enlarged the powers of the Commission and provided for a commerce court to hear and determine questions arising under the law. It passed the House in the last days of the Congress and failed of consideration in the Senate. The present law, named after Mr. HEPBURN, a Republican Congressman from Iowa, was enacted in the Fifty-ninth Congress. Democrats and Republicans voted for it, but it would have had votes sufficient if every Democrat in both Houses had voted against it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If I have given the correct history of interstate-commerce legislation, does it lie with any man to claim that the rate law or the principles which it represents are of Democratic origin or conception? Has the President departed from Republican policies when he has advocated it?

But we are told that attempts at regulation of the trusts are certainly Democratic. Have not the Democrats always been against the trusts? Have they not in conventions condemned them, and on the stump and in the press have they not fought them? No one will deny it. But what is the history of antitrust legislation and of its enforcement?

In 1890 John Sherman, a Republican Senator from Ohio, introduced in the Republican Senate a bill which bears his name, and after it passed the Senate was sent to a Republican House, and after passing that body it became a law by the signature of a Republican President. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may have time to complete his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The control of the time is in the hands of the committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope somebody will yield time sufficient to the gentleman to finish his speech——

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman, the time he requests.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, if the gentleman will allow me, I want to correct him about the Sherman bill. I know the gentleman does not want to state a thing that would not be correct. I know the gentleman does not want to do that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me finish this.

The Sherman Act became a law July 2, 1890.

During President Cleveland's Administration, the work under the Sherman law is represented by four bills in equity, two informations, and two indictments. Four of these cases pertained to the Debs matter.

Under President Roosevelt's Administration, up to December 1, 1907, sixteen bills in equity, one forfeiture proceedings, eighteen indictments, and two contempt proceedings.

As compared with President Cleveland's Administration, there have been under the present Administration four times as many bills in equity filed, nine times as many indictments found, and seven times as many convictions had, with nine indictment cases still pending.

The antitrust law is not of Democratic origin; its enforcement is not to Democratic credit.

But it is by some claimed that the Cleveland Administration was not to the liking of the modern Bryan Democracy. However that may be, allow me to remind gentlemen that that Administration was more in harmony with the history and traditions of the Democratic party than have been the principles and policies of that party since, and the Fifty-third Congress was Democratic in both branches, and Cleveland was President; and, what is more, Mr. Bryan was a Member of Congress and could at least have called his party's attention to the need of antitrust-law enforcement. He had a voice for speaking and a disposition to use it. The law was on the statute books and the trust was abroad in the land. I have looked in vain for a recorded speech or for the record of a resolution delivered or introduced by him on the subject. I have heard he introduced a resolution and that it died from gross neglect, but I have been unable to find a record of it.

I have recounted this little history not for the purpose of claiming honor for the Republican party for what it has done so much as to dispute the unwarranted claims of our Democratic brethren. I repeat that they have helped pass some good laws, but they have originated none of them. They sometimes make good helpers, but thus far they have made sorry work of initiating and directing. My experience and acquaintance with the Members of the minority in this House lead me sincerely to believe that the wisest of them at least are satisfied that their party is not qualified to conduct the great business of government. Many of them have been so engaged in talking buncomb to constituencies which evidently are easily fooled that they have got into a habit of insincere thought and action that would work ill to the country in the future as it has worked disaster in the past. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken longer than I had intended, but I submit that the provocation has been great. I am and have been a believer in and, I trust, a consistent worker for just and equitable relations between the people and the great interstate corporations chartered and sustained by law; not for the purpose of partisan advantage, but for the good—nay, for the safety—of the Government itself. I have never inquired nor cared for the political origin of any measure before Congress. Right and justice are not copyrighted by any party. I have never knowingly worked nor voted for any measure that would injure any legitimate enterprise of the country, and it has seemed impossible to sit in silence under the charge that the enactment and enforcement of laws against great wrongs were subversive of the principles of good government and the cause of industrial and financial depression. Neither could I longer possess my soul in patience while gentlemen lost sight of the qualities of exalted American statesmanship and descended to the plane of the politician to claim a credit they did not deserve.

A new order of things is established in the land. The people are aroused to their rights, and neither the schemes of the vicious nor the tricks of the demagogue will avail to deceive them. More than ever before they are demanding of their legislators—municipal, State, and national—honest, fearless, and patriotic service. We must not and will not be deterred by the evil prophecies of lawbreakers.

No rogue e'er felt the halter draw
With good opinion of the law.

The act of 1906 and the enforcement of law against public malefactors have not impaired and will not impair the general prosperity, but will contribute to permanent justice and equality. The policies of the present Administration were conceived in patriotism and born of Republican parents. [Loud applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD]. Afterwards I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] five minutes, and then to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, it is now thirty-four years since I last addressed this great body of representative Americans, and it touches me with deep sadness that of all my associates in the Forty-third Congress only one—the Speaker of the House—remains. Of the Ohio delegation, all have passed to the great beyond. Of all the Members then assembled here, twelve only are still on earth. New men, new States, and new issues are before us.

There were historical characters in that Congress, men called to deal with both ethical and fundamental questions growing out of the civil war, questions that stirred the blood and commanded the most potent mental endeavor. Just across this aisle sat two intellectual athletes—Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, and S. S. Cox, of Ohio and New York—who continuously measured the strength and potency of their rasping scimiters at close range. In the seat where now sits our valuable and worthy chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MANN] sat my old Army comrade, James A. Garfield, then chairman of that committee, and afterwards President of the United States. Right in front of the Speaker's desk, in his wheeled chair, was Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, vice-president of the Confederate States, a man if intense and powerful intellectuality, a true type of that great array of intellecual giants that made both the House and the Senate great forums of debate during and after the war.

James G. Blaine, the idol of his party, was Speaker of the House and the recognized leader. On the Republican side sat six representatives of the negro race, just enfranchised, and on the Democratic side ten or twelve of the battle-scarred veterans of the Confederate army. I had the honor of a seat between General "Joe" Hawley, of Connecticut, and George Frisbie Hoar, of Massachusetts, the former then famous as a soldier, the latter as the exponent of the highest culture in the domain of civics. But lest I be classed as a reminiscence, I will not indulge in reminiscences further. I am not a pessimist. I believe in to-day, I believe in the future, I believe in the better day to come. And if the debates I have listened to in this Congress seem tame and commonplace it is because no great vital questions to stir men's blood have been under consideration, questions to waken the full force of high intellectual effort.

It is great crises that make great orators and a great soldier is only born of a great war. It is not great men who create epochs of human history; it is epochs that make great men. Had there been no Trojan war there would have been no Homer. Had there been no conflict of the kings in the formative period of English literature there would have been no Shakespeare. Had there been no civil strife there would have been no Abraham Lincoln. Should a great crisis confront this Congress, I sincerely believe that there is material on this floor, on both sides of this historic Chamber, to equal in forensic power the record of the past. Such a crisis may not be far off.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss, in the fewest possible words, the remarkable message of the President. The most remarkable in salient features of any ever read on this floor. I shall discuss it in sorrow, and surely without prejudice or party bias, as all the hot-whetted shafts, delivered with such terrific force and venom are aimed at the men who control and dominate the principles and policies of the President's own party. No Member on this side of the House is hit or lacerated by the President's double-edged and powerful cleaver. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What I feel impelled to say is not all my own inspiration, but comes from the earnest prodding of the brave and patient people whom I have the honor to represent.

My people are in great distress. Our merchants are complaining of falling trade; our manufacturers are curtailing their output. Five thousand worthy workers in Toledo, Ohio, are out of work and eating the bitter bread of charity. The same deplorable condition exists all over this unhappy country. Labor is in despair and desperate from hunger in all our larger cities. What, then, is the vital question of the hour? Should not the universal answer be for a movement of all representatives of both parties, without consideration of party or partisan gain, for legislation to calm the general discontent and aid in the restoration of confidence; to start again the wheels of industry, to again employ labor, and in the sacred name of humanity to make a united and heroic effort to relieve the millions of men, women, and children in the pangs of despair and starvation.

We are in the midst of a severe crisis. In Chicago, in New York, in all our great cities, a vast multitude are desperate and ripe for revolution, and this is no time for political philippics. This is a time for calm judgment, for humane consideration of the best possible measures to relieve the universal distress.

Concede all the President's message contains to be true, what called it forth at this time? After the great battles of the civil war we used to gather at night by the lights of the bivouac fires and the lanterns of the ambulance corps and bury our dead under flags of truce. On the one side the Blue, on the other the Gray. No hostile shots were ever fired during this saddest and most sacred of all the terrible duties of war. To-day, in the midst of the dead and the wounded, the result of the disastrous money panic of last October, let us not pause to discuss the cause, or fix the blame, or punish the guilty, but let us all unite as patriots and forget that we are partisans and agree on a measure of relief in the interest of business and of labor, to whom idleness is either beggary or death. [Applause on the Democratic side.] As I read the President's message, he offers no advice on a proper measure to relieve the distress of his countrymen. He hinges his message on the Supreme Court decision declaring the employers' liability act unconstitutional, and he recommends new legislation. This is all proper and important, but is there any issue here? Is there any opposition to this proposed legislation? I have heard of none. The day following the Supreme Court decision a Senator [KNOX, of Pennsylvania] prepared and introduced a bill to cure the legal defects of the law declared unconstitutional. As to a new railroad-rate bill, the President knows that the original rate bill of the last Congress was amended and emasculated by the President's own party out of all vitality and value. The President also knows that the same Senators and Representatives that emasculated and made valueless the old rate bill are now absolutely dominating both branches of this Congress, and he also knows that he used all the power of his great office to elect this same Congress. And now the question is under vigorous discussion everywhere, especially in labor circles. [Applause on Democratic side.] What has caused this sudden and unexpected zeal of the President on behalf of the wageworkers? Is it a political play to exploit and stampede labor in the interest of the candidacy of the Secretary of War? Or is it a spectacular and sensational play to divert the attention of the country from the all-pervading distress? [Applause on the Democratic side.] The President, like the Secretary of War, has a labor record that needs extensive patching to make it at all presentable. [Applause and laughter.] Let me refer to the recent troubles at Goldfield, Nev. Contrary to all precedent, contrary to law, in order to aid the mine owners to crush out the miners' union, the President called out the United States troops. What did the mine owners want?

First. A sweeping reduction of wages.

Second. To destroy organized labor by refusing employment to every miner unless he should renounce his membership in the Western Federation of Miners. This act is in direct violation of the State law of Nevada bearing upon this subject.

Third. To force the miners to accept scrip in lieu of cash, the mine owners refusing to guarantee it, a scrip issued in violation of Federal law regulating the issuance of currency.

I have here a very voluminous report, bearing upon this last of the labor troubles in the Rocky Mountain regions. This report was made by a commission appointed by the President to make a thorough examination and investigation into the causes of the Goldfield strike, and the necessity for sending the United States Army to Goldfield to aid in wiping out the miners' union. I have the report in full in my possession, though it is not now available. Why it was not printed I can not say. The demands for it are great. This report has great value not only to every wageworker in the United States, but to every Representative on the floor of this Congress. This special investigating commission was appointed by the President December 11, 1907, and the report submitted December 30.

The President's order is as follows:

> You are hereby directed to proceed immediately to Goldfield, Nev., and make an investigation at that place into the conditions existing there at this time, and you will, on your return to Washington, submit a report to me personally.

This commission was composed of Lawrence O. Murray, Assistant Secretary of Commerce; Charles P. Neill, Commissioner of Labor; Herbert Knox Smith, Commissioner of Corporations.

Why this commission was ordered to report to the President personally I do not know. The Constitution and laws recognize only one person in the White House, but now it seems we have two—Theodore Roosevelt, the President, and Gen. Theodore Roosevelt, the person.

As to the report, I quote a paragraph on page 11:

> The strike grew out of a refusal on the part of the miners to accept cashier's checks in payment for their wages, the miners insisting upon some form of guaranty by the mine operators of whatever paper was accepted in lieu of cash. Various propositions were made, but no basis of agreement was reached.

This plan was prepared by the mine owners, according to the President's commission, and they were afraid to attempt its execution without the aid of Federal troops. The mine owners therefore secretly arranged with Governor Sparks to call upon President Roosevelt for troops when they were ready to spring the programme and force its provisions upon the miners.

The following is from page 12 of the report:

> The action of the mine operators warrants the belief that they had determined upon a reduction in wages and the refusal of employment to members of the Western Federation of Miners, but that they feared to take this course of action unless they had the protection of Federal troops, and that they accordingly laid a plan to secure such troops and then put their programme into effect.

In short, up to the time the troops arrived and for six months prior thereto there had been no unusual conditions of violence or disorder or any such conditions as would in any way justify the presence of the Federal troops or their retention there. The conditions did not support the general allegation in the governor's request for troops, nor were his specific statements established to any such extent as to justify his use of these statements for the purpose of getting Federal troops.

Now, I unhesitatingly declare that the sending of the troops to Goldfield was not only unnecessary, but in direct violation of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and this report, made by the President's specially appointed commission, proves it. The report of the President's special commission shows the sending of United States troops to Goldfield was a criminal outrage. I quote from this report, page 13:

Neither the county commissioners, the sheriff, nor the district attorney were consulted, nor had any of them even a suspicion of the action which had been taken. The first news that the city had that it was in a condition of lawlessness and disorder requiring the intervention of the Federal Government was when dispatches appeared in the papers that the troops had been called for and were then on their way to Goldfield. When the fact was ascertained positively that the troops were actually on their way to Goldfield a formal protest was telegraphed to the governor by most of the county officials.

In this connection it is proper to refer to another feature of the case, which was fully reported in the western papers, but for obvious reasons was omitted from the report of the President's commission. According to the accounts of these papers, which have not been denied, SIMON GUGGENHEIM, of Colorado, and a few others of his class representing the mine owners' interests of Nevada, met with the governor of Nevada, entertained him at a banquet in a convivial fashion, and it was by this means the governor's consent was secured to call for troops when the mine owners were ready for them. Indeed, this account stated that the governor was in an irresponsible state when this conspiracy to crush union labor was hatched. Whether this be true or not it has never been denied.

Do you want more evidence that our heroic and much-idolized President, so suddenly full of new-born zeal for organized labor, has only a record of words on the labor question? Let us examine briefly another cruel chapter of lurid history.

On February 17, 1906, three officers of the Western Federation of Miners—Moyer, Haywood, and Pettibone—men without guile, guilty of no crime, were arrested between 9 and 11 o'clock Saturday night. They were arrested on warrants sworn out by the county attorney of Canyon County, Vanduyn by name, and this affidavit was false. The warrants were issued from Caldwell, Idaho, the home of Stunenberg, where he was killed. The warrants were placed in the hands of Idaho officers, who went to Denver. Haywood was arrested while leaving the Federation offices between 9 and 10 o'clock. Pettibone was at home; his wife being absent, on her return found him gone. Pinkerton detectives, under the direct charge of Adjutant-General Wells, guarded the men rigorously until the special train, which had been previously arranged for, was ready. The men were not permitted to consult counsel nor was any information as to their whereabouts permitted to leak out until after they were safely aboard the special train. This train made no stops at any station during the 1,000-mile journey, except at watering tanks and coaling stations.

An announcement was publicly made by the Pinkerton detectives who had directed the kidnaping that their fate was sealed and that they would never leave the State of Idaho alive. When the facts of the arrest and the methods became known the whole body of organized labor was aroused and tremendous excitement stirred the entire labor world. The supreme court of Idaho refused to consider their application for habeas corpus and this decision was confirmed by the supreme court of the United States, Justice McKenna giving a dissenting opinion. No case of more vital interest to labor was ever before that august tribunal. Here was a chance for the President of the United States to proclaim in thunder tones for the great fundamental rights of man guaranteed by the Constitution. But he was as silent as the oysters of Oyster Bay. Instead of this the President took occasion to denounce these three innocent officials who were, as it was claimed, about to be railroaded to the gallows as "undesirable citizens." He also sent Secretary Taft to the State of Idaho when an election was pending to plead the cause of the governor and in effect to aid the conspiracy that was seeking to hang the labor officials and drive organized labor from the State.

Neither England, nor France, nor Germany, nor Austria has ever been cursed by a King or Queen or Emperor who has publicly voiced his convictions, denouncing a suspected subject on trial for his life. It remained for the United States to produce such an official in the person of President Roosevelt, violating the most sacred traditions of all Christian nations.

I am not aiming to pose as the champion of organized labor on this floor. I do not assume to represent organized labor alone. I did not have the indorsement of organized labor in my campaign for Congress. But I stand for men. I stand for all the measures of reform borrowed by the President. I am for all the so-called "Roosevelt policies," except militarism, imperialism, and vampirism. The President stands for nothing of any vitality that he did not borrow from the Democratic platforms of 1896 and 1900. I was for all these policies and working side by side with the peerless leader from Nebraska for a whole decade, while the self-appointed champion of these policies, now in the White House, was before the American people denouncing Bryan and his cause as dangerous and anarchistic. [Loud applause on Democratic side.]

And I am as ready and anxious to vote for these principles in the coming November as I was in 1896. But not under a newly converted leader devoted to militarism and imperialism and the reckless waste of the people's hard-earned tax money. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I prefer a leader tried and true, prescient with truth, endowed with unwavering fidelity to the cause of the people, and not a wabbler, looking daily for a new slogan to win unthinking applause. I see that leader now. I see our champion still in the limelight, as in 1896. In mental endowment he is the superior of the "strenuous one" without his imperial swagger. [Laughter and applause.] He never appeals to those who exalt the cruel or the brutal. He would never, if President, hold Japanese wrestling matches on the White House carpets. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] He never stabbed to death a cub mountain lion amid the wild plaudits of the cow punchers and broncho busters. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] He never drank the brutish milk of the she bear in Louisiana canebrakes, but in moral grandeur he towers above the dictator of the White House as the Washington Monument above the marshes of the Potomac. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Our champion is broader in culture, riper in that knowledge of affairs that comes from travel and contact with the best minds of both continents. He is better poised and safer balanced. His name is William Jennings Bryan. [Loud Democratic applause.] And the shibboleth of our Democracy shall be:

The flag of these shining stars of States shall never float over a country where the sword and the man on horseback usurp the functions of justice, liberty, and constitutional law. [Loud and long-continued applause on the Democratic side.]

The following is the report to which I made reference in my speech:

THE GOLDFIELD STRIKE.

DECEMBER 30, 1907.

SIR: On December 11, 1907, you issued to us the following instructions:

"You are hereby directed to proceed immediately to Goldfield, Nev., and make an investigation at that place into the conditions existing there at this time, and you will, on your return to Washington, submit a report to me personally.

"All Federal officials, both civil and military, are hereby directed to render you any assistance that you may need, and to give you access to any information, papers, or documents that they may have bearing on the situation."

In accordance therewith we left Washington on the afternoon of December 11, arriving at Goldfield, Nev., in the evening of the 15th, and proceeded at once to make the investigation directed. We gave our entire time to this object, continuing hearings and interviews every day, and usually until midnight, with the help of one, and later two, stenographers, until the morning of December 21, when we left Goldfield and returned to Washington.

Immediately upon our arrival in Goldfield we conferred with General Funston, who had been investigating the situation there for several days previous to our arrival, and who remained for some days and assisted us in every way in our work. We next discussed the situation fully with the governor of the State, who was at Goldfield, and then met a committee from the miners' union and the executive committee of the Goldfield Mine Operators' Association. We thus obtained at the outset a comprehensive preliminary survey of the general situation.

The Mine Operators' Association, through their counsel, then presented to us a general statement of their side of the case, and, as they were the persons primarily desiring the coming and the retention of the troops, we informed them that we would regard this written statement as analogous to the plaintiff's complaint in a court action, and that we would at once call upon them to make out their case and lay before them the responsibility of producing as rapidly as possible the evidence therein, reserving to ourselves, of course, the right to hear thereafter evidence on the other side. They agreed to this procedure, which seemed to be the most practical way of handling the matter, and for several days brought before us numerous witnesses, documents, and other evidence intended to substantiate the allegations of their so-called complaint and demonstrate the need for Federal troops. Their counsel was informed that our primary object was to secure information bearing on the question as to what justification existed for the call for Federal troops and for their continuance at Goldfield, and, after several days of hearings, on December 20, he assured us that he had produced substantially the best evidence on his side of the case, that anything more he might bring would be simply cumulative, and, in substance, that he rested his case on what he had presented.

Inasmuch as we were by this time satisfied that the mine operators had not in any particular established a case justifying either the bringing or the retention of the troops, we did not deem it necessary to take any extensive evidence on the other side, and the hearing was substantially closed with a brief formal interview with the said committee from the miners' union.

THE QUESTION BEFORE THE COMMISSION.

The Federal troops had been sent to Goldfield on the request of the governor of Nevada, dated December 5, 1907, and we made it therefore the primary object of our work to ascertain, first, whether the state of facts existing in Goldfield prior to and at the arrival of the troops corresponded with the allegations of said request of the governor of Nevada and gave sufficient ground for the sending of the troops, and, second, whether the conditions existing at Goldfield upon the arrival of the troops and up to and during the time of our stay there afforded a sufficient basis for their retention at that point; and, if so, for what period they should be retained.

Incidentally, we necessarily informed ourselves briefly as to the merits of the industrial controversy there existing, but only so far as the same had some bearing on the question of law and order and the presence of the Federal troops. Any complete or satisfactory examination into the general merits of the industrial dispute would have covered many weeks and would have been impossible for us to make, having as we did no power to administer oaths or compel the attendance of witnesses or the production of evidence.

Inasmuch as the troops are still in Goldfield and the question of their retention there is an important issue, we deem it proper to submit to you herewith a report bearing on this question, and we therefore direct our findings in this report to a consideration of those facts which are relevant to this question in view of the requirements of section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution, sections 5297, 5298, and 5299 of the Revised Statutes, and the act of June 18, 1878, and to a consideration of the question as to what facts existed at Goldfield before and since the arrival of the troops to constitute the grounds of action described by the said article of the Constitution and the said statutory sections.

"Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to enforce by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings the laws of the United States within any State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia of any or all the States and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States or to suppress such rebellion in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed."

SECTION 5299, REVISED STATUTES.—Power to suppress insurrection in violation of civil rights.

"Whenever insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations, or conspiracies in any State so obstructs or hinders the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States, as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, or immunities or protection named in the Constitution and secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, or immunities, and the constituted authorities of such State are unable to protect or from any cause fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States; and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy opposes or obstructs the laws of the United States or the due execution thereof or impedes or obstructs the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty, to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary, for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations."

Revised Statutes, section 5298, deals only with insurrections against the Government of the United States; Revised Statutes, section 5299, deals only with violations of rights, privileges, immunities, or protection secured by the Constitution of the United States. These two sections may be, therefore, dismissed from consideration with the simple statement that there is absolutely no evidence showing the existence of any insurrection against the Government of the United States or the violation of any Federal rights.

Section 4, Article IV, of the Constitution provides as follows:

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature can not be convened) against domestic violence."

Section 5297, Revised Statutes, based on the above constitutional provision, is as follows:

"In case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President, on application of the legislature of such State, or of the executive, when the legislature can not be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, which may be applied for, as he deems sufficient to suppress such insurrection; or, on like application, to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he deems necessary."

Act June 18, 1878, chapter 262, section 15:

"From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States, as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress; and no money appropriated by this act shall be used to pay any of the expenses incurred in the employment of any troops in violation of this section; and any person willfully violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years or by both such fine and imprisonment."

The said constitutional section and the said statute based thereon, together with said act of June 18, 1878, being clearly the only provision of law possibly applicable in the premises, we took them as a guide for our investigation into the facts existing at Goldfield. It is true that the call of the governor of Nevada of December 5 was apparently based upon and followed largely the wording of section 5299, probably under a misapprehension of the force of that section. The attorney-general of the State informed us that he had been consulted in the preparation of the call and that it had been based upon section 5299. The governor stated in that call, however, that certain facts existed, which facts, if sufficiently verified and if broad enough in their scope and important enough in their bearings, might conceivably furnish sufficient ground for Federal action under section 5297, Revised Statutes, and although, as above set forth, it was obvious that the governor in framing the said request had before him especially section 5299, which was wholly inapplicable, nevertheless it was, of course, necessary to look rather at the substance than at the form of the request and to ascertain whether the facts so stated formed a basis of action under section 5297, Revised Statutes. The request of the governor was as follows:

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Nevada, ss:

"To His Excellency Theodore Roosevelt,
"President of the United States:

"At Goldfield, Esmeralda County, State of Nevada, there does now exist domestic violence and unlawful combination and conspiracies, which do now so obstruct, and continue to obstruct and hinder, the execution of the laws of the State of Nevada, and now deprive, and continue to deprive, the people of said section of the State of the rights, privileges, immunities, and protection named in the Constitution of the United States, and of the State of Nevada, and which are secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, and immunities; and the constituted authorities of the State of Nevada are now, and continue to be, unable to protect the people in such rights, and the reason of such inability and the particulars thereof are the following, to wit:

"Unlawful dynamiting of property, commission of felonies, threats against the lives and property of law-abiding citizens, the unlawful possession of arms and ammunition and the confiscation of dynamite, with threats of the unlawful use of the same by preconcerted action.

"The lawfully constituted authorities of this State are unable to apprehend and punish the perpetrators of said crimes, and to prevent the commission of other threatened crimes, and unless the relief hereinafter requested is granted, this State, and the lives and property of large numbers of its people, will be irreparably affected and damaged, contrary to the peace and dignity of the United States and of the State of Nevada.

"Therefore, pursuant to Article IV, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States, and to sections 5297 and 5299 of the Revised Statutes thereof, I, John Sparks, governor, do hereby respectfully request that Your Excellency, Theodore Roosevelt, President, do immediately send to Goldfield, Esmeralda County, Nev., two companies of the troops of the Army of the United States, to suppress unlawful disorder and violence, to protect life and property, to restore peace, and to insure protection of law to the people of the State of Nevada.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed, at the capitol, Carson City, Nev., on this 5th day of December, A. D. 1907.

"[SEAL.] JOHN SPARKS, Governor."

While the first part contains a number of allegations, they are general and formal in nature. The specific statements of fact contained in the call appear in the second paragraph.

FACTS AS TO SITUATION IN GOLDFIELD.

With these legal considerations in view, our findings are as follows:

There has existed at Goldfield, which is exclusively a mining town of an estimated population of between 15,000 and 20,000 in southern Nevada, for over a year past, and especially since the spring of 1907, a disturbed industrial situation, due to frequently recurring labor difficulties between the mine operators on the one hand and the miners on the other. The two sides were represented almost completely by the Goldfield Mine Operators' Association, including almost all the owners, operators, or lessees of mines on the one hand, and by the local union of the Western Federation of Miners on the other, a union comprising substantially all the miners in Goldfield. This union, known as Goldfield Miners' Union, No. 220, is a branch of the general organization known as the Western Federation of Miners. It has carried on its rolls a membership estimated at above 3,000 men, which number, however, included members of crafts in Goldfield other than workers in and about mines. Figures furnished us by the mine operators showed that about 1,900 mine workers went on strike on November 27, 1907. Although a number of strikes and minor difficulties had occurred during 1907, the only acute situation arising prior to the call for troops existed in the spring of 1907. This controversy involved not only a dispute between the mine owners and the miners at Goldfield, but also between the members of the miners' union and the members of other crafts in Goldfield affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The Goldfield Miners' Union was also affiliated with the organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World, and an effort was made to force members of other crafts not affiliated with the organization to join its ranks. Not only the Mine Owners' Association and members of the miners' union went armed, but members of crafts not affiliated with the Industrial Workers of the World felt it necessary to carry arms to protect themselves while at work. The condition of Goldfield at that time was that of an armed camp, and for a time a serious clash seemed imminent. The controversy resulted in a murder of a restaurant keeper and aroused such opposition against the Industrial Workers of the World that a ban was practically put upon them, and the organization under that name was forced to abandon Goldfield. This acute situation disappeared before the end of the spring of 1907.

A succession of miners' strikes, however, had taken place throughout 1907, some of them with apparently little justification; and although the operators had yielded to nearly all the demands of the union, it seemed impossible to secure any settled industrial conditions. The mine operators insist that the socialistic doctrine adopted and preached by the Western Federation of Miners practically justified the stealing of ore by the miner. Some of the mines at Goldfield are among the richest in the world. They maintain, and of this there is little doubt, that this phenomenally rich ore is daily stolen to the amount of many hundreds of dollars by some of the miners, and that the representatives of the union have resisted and attempted to nullify reasonable attempts on the part of the mine owners to protect themselves against these thefts by "change" rooms or otherwise.

The industrial situation was further aggravated by the fact that the Goldfield Union would not enter into any contract governing working conditions for any specified length of time, and the mine operators, therefore, could have no assurance at any time that any settlement of a dispute was more than a temporary makeshift, nor could they secure any assurance of stable industrial conditions for any fixed length of time.

Moreover, the Goldfield Miners' Union embraces in one single union not only the various crafts working in and about the mines, but also clerks, waiters, bartenders, and other miscellaneous crafts and avocations in Goldfield.

On November 27, 1907, a strike of the miners was inaugurated and is still in effect. This strike grew out of a refusal on the part of the miners to accept cashiers' checks in payment of their wages. The miners insisted upon some form of guaranty by the mine operators of whatever paper was accepted in lieu of cash. Various propositions were made, but no basis of agreement was reached.

The merits of this controversy are not of importance here, as we are concerned solely with the question of whether or not conditions warranted the calling for Federal troops. The mine operators insist that the attitude of the miners in refusing to accept cashiers' checks in payment of wages in the then acute currency condition of the country was unjustifiable, and that this as a culmination to their past experience exhausted their patience and definitely determined them to make a final break with the Western Federation of Miners and establish their permanent independence of that organization. The miners contend that their demand for a guaranty of the scrip by the mine operators was entirely proper and just, and that the mine operators sought a strike as a means to secure Federal troops, and then reduce wages and destroy the union in Goldfield.

The action of the mine operators warrants the belief that they had determined upon a reduction in wages and the refusal of employment to members of the Western Federation of Miners, but that they feared to take this course of action unless they had the protection of Federal troops, and that they accordingly laid a plan to secure such troops and then put their programme into effect.

A committee of the mine operators went to see the governor on December 2, and urged upon him the necessity of calling for the Federal troops to preserve peace and order in Goldfield. An agreement seems to have been reached that if conditions continued as they then were that the governor would issue such call, and the committee returned, after having agreed with the governor upon a code word which should be sent by telegraph to indicate the necessity for troops still existed.

Some days later the agreed-upon word was telegraphed to the governor, and he thereupon issued his call upon the President for troops. During this time, when conditions at Goldfield were represented to be in such lawless state as to demand Federal troops there was apparently no discussion of the subject whatever carried on outside of the Mine Operators' Association. No indication was permitted to become public as to the real purpose of the call of the committee on the governor.

The papers published the fact of the presence of the committee from Goldfield at Reno and stated the purpose of its visit to be the selection of a site for a smelter. After the agreement with the governor and pending the sending of the telegraphic word agreed upon no public intimation was given in Goldfield that troops had been asked for or were expected. Neither the county commissioners, the sheriff, nor the district attorney were consulted, nor had any one of them even a suspicion of the action which had been taken. The first news that the city had that it was in a condition of lawlessness and disorder requiring the intervention of the Federal Government was when dispatches appeared in the papers that the troops had been called for and were then on their way to Goldfield. When the fact was ascertained positively that the troops were actually on their way to Goldfield a formal protest was telegraphed to the governor by most of the county officers.

The troops arrived in Goldfield on December 6. On December 7 the Goldfield Mine Operators' Association issued a public statement, in which, among other things, they said: "We propose to adopt fair and reasonable rules for the operation of our properties and employ men irrespective of whether they belong to unions." The rules and regulations adopted in pursuance of this statement made a general reduction in their wage scale amounting, in the case of miners, from five to four dollars per day, and also provided that the said association would not employ any man belonging to Goldfield Miners' Union, No. 220, of the Western Federation of Miners, or any other union in Goldfield or elsewhere that is connected or affiliated with the Western Federation of Miners, and, in pursuance of this provision, stated that each employee, if a member of this association, shall, as a condition of employment, be required to sign the following agreement:

"'In consideration of my being employed by the ——— company for such time as my services shall be satisfactory, and at wages heretofore fixed by said company, subject to the rules and regulations fixed by said company, and by the Goldfield Mine Operators' Association relating to the employment of men in and around mines of Goldfield mining district, I hereby covenant and agree with said company that I am not now and will not be during the time I am working for said company a member of Goldfield Miners' Union, No. 220, of the Western Federation of Miners, or of any other union in Goldfield or elsewhere that is directly or indirectly affiliated with or has any connection of any kind, nature, or description with said the Western Federation of Miners.

"'Witness my hand and seal at Goldfield, Esmeralda County, Nev., this —— day of ———, 190—.'"

While this cut in wages and refusal to employ members of the Western Federation of Miners was not announced until after the arrival of troops, every indication confirms the belief that such action was in contemplation before the arrival of troops, was part of the general plan of the mine operators to establish their independence of the union, and that the coming of the troops was expected and urged by them to make such plan feasible.

We find that from the spring of 1907 to the date of the arrival of the troops there were no conditions of especial violence or disorder in Goldfield or particular reasons why such disorder was likely to occur. Apart from the question of the personnel of the miners' union—a matter that will be discussed later—the situation was normal. The town had been for at least six months previous fully as free from disturbances as any mining town of similar situation and conditions. There had been no organized opposition to law. The number of homicides during the two years prior to the coming of the troops, as stated by the county officials, did not exceed half a dozen, and several of these had no relation to any labor difficulty. There was evidence that in the past two years a number of so-called "deportations" had taken place—that is, men had been driven out by union sympathizers either by threats or by actual violence—but probably the total number so forced out of town did not exceed 25 in two years. There were made before us, it is true, several statements of very much larger number, going as high as 700, but when all the witnesses had been asked to give names and facts in specific cases the number of such cases brought to our attention did not exceed 20. Moreover, numbers of these deportations were not in furtherance of any organized plan to drive out nonunion men. They represented the paying off of old scores due to former troubles in Cripple Creek and the Coeur d'Alenes.

There was no evidence of the unlawful use of dynamite, with the one exception that it was shown that one of the poles of the electric company's plant had been bored and dynamite cartridges inserted and lighted (which, however, failed to explode), and that a large number of other cartridges had been left at the base of the pole. No actual damage was done. This occurred shortly before the arrival of the troops. It was alleged by the miners' union that this had been done by the mine operators themselves in order to produce the appearance of violence; and while we express no opinion as to who placed the dynamite there, it must be admitted in the circumstances in the case that the clumsy way in which the work was done at least raises a reasonable doubt as to the genuineness of the attempt. We find that there were at the time of troops' arrival a considerable number of rifles in the possession of each party; that a large number of men in the town were carrying pistols, but probably not in much greater proportion than is true of most mining towns of this character. In short, up to the time the troops arrived and for six months prior thereto there had been no unusual conditions of violence or disorder or any such conditions as would in any way justify the presence of the Federal troops or their retention there. The conditions did not support the general allegations in the governor's request for troops, nor were his specific statements established to any such extent as to justify his use of these statements for the purpose of getting Federal troops.

The great bulk of the testimony submitted by the mine operators sets forth facts which tended to show not the existence of actual serious disorder in the past or in the present, but the possibilities of future disorders should the troops be withdrawn. It was this potential situation that was obviously in the minds of most of the men who appeared before us on behalf of the retention of the troops. Many men of almost all classes, whose assertions we believe to have been perfectly sincere, stated earnestly that they believed that should the troops be withdrawn there would very shortly arise a condition of serious disorder and violence, loss of life, and damage to property, taking the shape of a direct conflict between the miners' union and the mine operators. Inasmuch as the situation, as above stated, had remained substantially unchanged for the six months prior to the coming of the troops, during which time practically no one believed in the probability of an insurrection or serious disorder, and inasmuch as on December 5 the so-called insurrection was unknown to the community, and the coming of the troops a complete surprise, it was obvious that some new factors must have entered the situation very recently in order to produce these honest opinions as to future disorder.

We find that such new factors did enter, but after the troops arrived, and that they consisted of the announced determination aforesaid on the part of the mine operators, on December 7, to reduce wages and to refuse employment to members of the Western Federation; that this programme, if carried out, meant a struggle for its existence on the part of the union, and that these witnesses naturally felt that this struggle would, on the withdrawal of the troops, take the form of serious disorder. This explains to our minds the acuteness of the new situation that arose, the fears of many of those who appeared before us, and the desire expressed by so many that the troops should be retained.

Probably the most disturbing of the new factors was the refusal by the operators to employ members of the Western Federation, as above set forth, and this particular requirement, in our own opinion, was on its face contrary to the statute of Nevada, as follows:

"CHAP. CXI.—An act making it unlawful for employers to enter into agreements with their employees, or persons about to enter their employment, not to become or continue as members of labor organizations, and prescribing penalties for violations thereof. (Approved Mar. 17, 1903.)

"The people of the State of Nevada, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

"SEC. 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to make or enter into any agreement, either oral or in writing, by the terms of which any employee of such person, firm, or corporation, or any person about to enter the employ of such person, firm, or corporation, as a condition for continuing or obtaining such employment, shall promise or agree not to become or continue a member of a labor organization, or shall promise or agree to become or continue a member of a labor organization.

"SEC. 2. Any person or persons, firm or firms, corporation or corporations violating the provisions of section 1 of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not less than $50 or more than $300, or be imprisoned in the county jail for a period of not less than twenty-five days or more than five months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"SEC. 3. All acts or parts of acts in conflict with the above are hereby repealed."

The constitutionality of this statute, as well as its application, was questioned by the mine operators, but, of course, until it has been declared unconstitutional by judical decision it must be regarded as the law of that State.

Nevada has no State militia, its former force having been disbanded. The only force at the disposal of the governor consists of five State detectives, substantially all of whom are acting now as mine guards in Goldfield and in the pay of the mine operators, a force wholly inadequate to deal with any serious disorder. The governor informed us in writing that he would not convene the legislature and that he would not take any steps to organize a State militia under the State statutes; that in case the troops should be withdrawn he did not know what he would do, but so far as he could then see he would do nothing. The exact form of this statement was as follows:

Interview with Governor John Sparks, of Nevada, at Hotel Casey, Goldfield, Nev., December 17, 1907.

Present: Messrs. Smith, Murray, and Neill.

Mr. SMITH. We want to get in permanent and definite shape your decisions on the questions we talked of this afternoon. First, whether you will or will not convene the legislature?—A. I do not think that I can consistently do it.

Q. So you decline to do that?—A. For the present; yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. SMITH. As to another matter, Governor, there was suggested the appointment of a militia here?—A. Yes.

Q. What is your view on that?—A. Well, it would take considerable time to organize that. You mean a State militia?

Q. Yes, sir.—A. Well, I should oppose that. I have opposed it all the way along. The very people I am trying to protect knew that the soldiers were here and backed me up on that. I believe a State militia at this time would be disgraceful to the State.

Q. What I refer to especially is an emergency militia, which was suggested this afternoon right in this town.—A. An emergency militia? If we had the right kind of an emergency militia, it would operate all right, but I don't believe we could get that kind. That is one of the circumstances.

Q. So just what would be your action in case the troops are withdrawn?—A. Well, Mr. Smith, I have got to consider your proposition. I don't want to dodge any question you ask me, but at the present time I do not know what I would do. The chances are I would not do anything until these people here fought it out on common ground with one another. It seems they are prepared to do it. I don't want them to do it; I want to preserve peace, law, and order and protect the people more than property.

Mr. MURRAY. Governor, at the present time, you do not feel justified, then, in having the legislature in extraordinary session, nor to organize a State militia?

A. No, sir. I don't think it would be wise to do it. A State militia would not remedy the situation in my judgment.

December 18, 1907.

This is a correct copy and statement.

(Signed) JOHN SPARKS, Governor.

In brief, the attitude of the State was simply passive. The governor had in conference with him at the time his aid, Captain Cox, and the attorney-general, Mr. Stoddard, and after this interview, December 18, he left Goldfield and did not return during our stay.

We had conferences with the sheriff of the county, two of the three county commissioners, two of the assemblymen, and the district attorney, constituting all the representatives of the civil authorities of the county whose presence we could secure. Goldfield is not an incorporated city. There is a constable, but it appears, so far as we could ascertain, that since the removal of the county seat to Goldfield his powers have been largely superseded by those of the sheriff and that substantially the sheriff is the supreme and responsible peace officer of the county and the town. Our interview with these gentlemen was unsatisfactory in the extreme, lasting nearly ten hours continuously and until 10 o'clock of the night of December 19. We endeavored to get from them a statement, and especially from the sheriff, as to whether in their opinion the county officers could or could not maintain order in Goldfield should the troops be withdrawn. They each evaded this question to the utmost limit and in such a way that it was perfectly obvious that they did not dare to answer it directly, until at the end of our interview, when we finally secured from them all as the most direct definite statement they would make in answer to our single question on this point the following negation:

"Sheriff Ingalls, are you willing to say that if the troops are removed from here you can not maintain law and order in this town and protect life and property? Are you willing to say that?"

"No; I can not say that."

The same question was put to all the said county officers and the same answer was received. They all stated that they resented the call of troops by the governor; that their coming was unnecessary; but now that the troops were in Goldfield they wished that they might be kept there. They insisted that it was an insult to the citizens and officials of Goldfield to have brought in Federal troops to maintain order and that it conveyed an utterly false impression to the outside public.

In the case in question we find that, to put it tersely, the State of Nevada, with a population of about 70,000, and the city of Goldfield, with a population of probably 15,000, are thus far in the position of deliberately and expressly abdicating their governmental powers in the face of not more than a few hundred dangerous and disorderly men and of calling upon the Federal Government to perform the work of keeping these men in order by the use of Federal troops. We believe that such a condition illustrates to the extreme the false principles above condemned, and that it would be a precedent of infinitely evil possibilities should the Federal Government concur in any such position as the governor of Nevada and the officials of Esmeralda County desire it to take.

The above considerations apply to the fundamental question as to whether the troops should be indefinitely maintained in Goldfield, as is desired by many citizens there, and we believe that these considerations answer that question emphatically in the negative. Since we left Goldfield, however, and on December 31, the governor of Nevada has changed the decision he expressed to us and has issued a call convening the legislature of that State for January 14, 1908. We believe it proper and expedient, inasmuch as the troops are now in Goldfield at the request of the governor, that the troops should remain there until the assembling of the legislature to preserve the status quo, so that the legislature may deal with the situation as it now exists. But we also must firmly believe that upon the assembling of the legislature, or within a few days thereafter, the troops should be removed, regardless of any request for their retention that may be made by either the legislature or the governor of Nevada, it being essential that the State of Nevada shall understand this situation completely, shall recognize the fact that there will at that date be thrown upon it, and it alone, the primary responsibility of keeping order, and that, recognizing this responsibility, it may take such action as is the duty of the State and as will be sufficient in the premises.

Very respectfully,

LAWRENCE O. MURRAY,
Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor.
CHAS. P. NEILL,
Commissioner of Labor.
HERBERT KNOX SMITH,
Commissioner of Corporations.

The PRESIDENT, White House.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Chairman, while the House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I desire to submit a few observations on the state of the Union from the viewpoint of a small stockholder in a large corporation, known as a trust, created and existing under the laws of our country.

At the last session of this House, on Friday, I heard read the President's message, and I applauded the exhibited sincerity and honesty of purpose manifested in that remarkable document, and because of the many good recommendations contained therein I am convinced that it was written either by Mr. Roosevelt or by Mr. Bryan. I am quite sure it was not written either by the eminent and admired Speaker or by the distinguished and imposing leader of the majority.

The country will now watch with great interest to see whether or not the Republican majority in Congress will carry out the measures recommended in the message, or whether they will continue their policy of delay and do nothing—adjourning on Fridays to meet the following Monday.

But I did not rise to praise the message. Having only five minutes gives me but time to register a kick on behalf of the small stockholders of the big corporations, many of whom live in the Twenty-sixth Congressional District of Pennsylvania (God bless them).

We little stockholders agree with the President that a great deal of the corporate business of the country is corrupt, but we maintain that such corruption is made possible in the first instance by the unjust, stand-pat, high protective tariff, which should be forthwith revised.

We further believe that corporate profits have been diverted for the benefit of the few in control, and since the last Presidential election we have learned that a large portion of these profits were diverted into the hands of a national campaign treasurer, from whose hands no criminally contributed dollar ever returned.

We further feel that the punishment by spectacular fines for the crimes committed in the operation of certain corporations falls upon us, and not upon the wrongdoer. We small stockholders noticed with what ease the message swept us aside, recognizing no innocence, but simply saying that he who voluntarily purchases stock in a corporation whose methods and management he knows to be corrupt is not innocent. But we answer, What about him who does not know that the methods and management are corrupt? Such a one is as innocent as is the President innocent of those Presidential campaign corrupt contributions, and should not be punished any more than he has been.

Again, take the individual who has not voluntarily purchased the stock, but has come into its possession by inheritance. I say that such a stockholder is innocent, and to mulct such a one, perhaps a minor, or a widow, with any part of a fine often spectacular in its magnitude is not a square deal.

To be sure, the message cites a few cases where the individual "wealthy criminal" have been convicted, like Gaynor and Green, but in these flagrant cases there was no intervening corporation.

The message alleges that a favorite method of attack on the Administration is to blame it for not procuring the imprisonment of the individual wrongdoers, instead of merely fining the corporation, and the President adds that the man making this assault is either a prominent lawyer or an editor who takes his policies from the financiers and his arguments from their attorneys.

On the same day that this message was given to Congress, Governor Hughes, in his New York speech, declared that to prevent oppression through the conduct of large enterprises and to secure the enforcement of the law against illegal attempts to monopolize, and the various devices resorted to in unlawful restraint of trade, is the adequate punishment of the guilty. "I am not," he said, "in favor of punishment in the shape of fines upon corporations, except for minor offenses. The burden of fines imposed upon such corporations is either transferred to the public, or is borne by stockholders, the innocent as well as the guilty."

Mr. Chairman, Governor Hughes is a prominent lawyer. Is he one of those referred to by the President?

My high regard for the sincerity of the President is such that I believe he will yet see that in all cases where corporate crime is committed there are one or more individuals who are the guilty ones and who alone should be punished.

If our present distinguished President and his reluctant party do not provide means to reach the real culprits a Democratic President and the Democratic party will.

These corporate crimes from which we little stockholders, as well as the whole country, are suffering are corporate in name but individual in fact.

It was Judson Harmon who said, in the correspondence between himself and the Attorney-General, over two years ago, in the now almost forgotten Paul Morton Atchison rebate case, that "Guilt is always personal. So long as officials can hide behind their corporations no remedy can be effective. When the Government searches out the guilty man and makes corporate wrongdoing mean personal punishment and dishonor the laws will be obeyed."

Mr. Chairman, had it been known in the beginning of the Christian era that crime, which is necessarily always personal, could be committed through the instrumentality of a corporation, and, when detected, punished only by a spectacular fine imposed on the corporation, I have no doubt but that the unrepentant thief could have successfully accomplished his ends without individual liability, and there would have been one unoccupied cross on Mount Calvary.

The President is always honest, but not always right. At one time he honestly thought that English words were not spelled correctly in the standard dictionaries of the day.

As far as I know, the words in this last message are all spelled according to Webster's Unabridged.

So that, relying upon his honesty, sincerity, and manliness to change when in the wrong, we little stockholders hope that this Administration will go gunning after the real culprits guilty of these corporate crimes, and thereby make the remedy effective without paralyzing the whole business community with fear.

This is one of the omissions which should be supplied. If this Administration does not the Democratic party will.

Mr. Chairman, I have tried to register the kick of the little stockholder; the next election will show that there are many millions of us. The burden of our song is "Guilt is always personal. The corporate evils which confront us are corporate in name, but individual in fact."

I notice in this morning's newspapers an interview with the present Attorney-General, Mr. Bonaparte, in which he says:

There is one matter, however, about which I can speak with knowledge. If great clusters of corporations, such as the Standard Oil Company, the tobacco trust, the powder trust, and our well-known railroad systems, are not to be punished by fines imposed on convicted corporations, this means that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred they will not be punished at all.

It is often possible to obtain legal proof on which to convict the corporation, when it would be altogether impossible to obtain evidence to satisfy a jury against any one of its superior officers. This statement may seem a little strange to persons inexperienced in criminal law, but a lawyer who has to enforce such statutes as the antitrust law will soon learn its truth.

It will be seen that from the beginning of the Administration to the present time there is no intention or desire to pursue the effective remedy based upon the maxim that "Guilt is always personal." If the question of effectively remedying the so-called "corporate crimes" from which we are suffering is to be one of the leading questions of the coming Presidential campaign, the name of Judson Harmon, of Ohio, should be upon the Democratic ticket.

The necessity of individual punishment for corporate crime is so well set forth by Judson Harmon in the correspondence in the Paul Morton Atchison rebate case that I ask unanimous consent to insert it as an extension of my remarks.

In this correspondence, which was published at the time by the President, the reply of Judson Harmon to the Attorney-General's letter of March 21, 1905, was inadvertently omitted, and I am unable to supply it at this time. It will be noticed that Mr. Harmon and Mr. Judson were not permitted to be counsel of record, but that their authority was carefully limited to merely appear before the examiner only, and gave them no right to appear in court, an authority quite nugatory. In the reply, which is not published, the Attorney-General's attention was called to this, but the request for authority to proceed was not granted. It will be further remembered that in the end Mr. Morton's word was taken as establishing individual innocence, although corporate crime was admitted, instead of letting him go into court, the natural and proper way, and clear himself if he could of the responsibility for what was done by the department specially in his charge, because during the period of these enormous and continued rebates he was the head of the traffic department.

The correspondence was as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, February 28, 1905.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

SIR: We have the honor to inform you that, as directed in your letters of the 14th instant, we have carefully examined the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the matter of alleged unlawful rates and practices in the transportation of coal and mine supplies by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, and also the evidence on which the report was founded. We beg now to state the results of our consideration of the questions arising thereon.

The conclusions stated in the report concerning transportation of coal appear to be fully sustained by the evidence. From August, 1902, until December, 1904, the railway company continuously transported coal for the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company at less than the published rates then in force from various points in Colorado and elsewhere to El Paso, Tex., Deming, N. Mex., and other places, to which such transportation was interstate commerce.

This was done by secret arrangement between the two companies, under which the coal was apparently billed at the published rate of freight, although in fact the price of the coal was included. The railroad company collected the amount shown by the billing, and paid over part of it to the fuel company as the price of the coal, making the real charge for transportation less than the published rate by just that amount. At the same time the rates given and charged other shippers were the published tariff rates without any deduction.

This plan, and the way it was carried out, plainly indicate an intention to deceive the Government and the public, and to enable the fuel company to gain a monopoly of the coal supply at the points involved by giving them a strong advantage over competitors in the actual cost of transporation. The motive for thus favoring the fuel company does not appear in the evidence thus far taken, but the fact is clear.

Only one of the chief officers of the railway company in charge of traffic has been called as a witness, and only one of such officers of the fuel company. No immunity from prosecution can be claimed for any other officer of either company. No papers whatever were produced by or on behalf of the fuel company, so that no immunity can be claimed for it. And while certain papers of the railway company were produced, it is not entitled to immunity for that reason, because the papers produced all related to charges for transportation and are by law made public. The immunity provided by the statutes applies only in case of private papers whose production could not be required but for the immunity so given. Assuming, therefore, that a corporation might claim immunity in a proper case by reason of the production of its papers, this is not such a case.

You further direct us, in case we find that the law has been violated, "to recommend what character of proceedings the evidence justifies, and against whom the same should be taken to secure the vindication of the law." We therefore beg to make the following recommendations:

On March 25, 1902, in the suit of the United States against the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Missouri, western division, an order of injunction was issued, forbidding said railway company, its officers, agents, and servants from acting under, enforcing, or executing in any manner whatever any agreement to transport over its railroad, or any part thereof, any interstate traffic at other than the established scheduled rates, and also from "thereafter agreeing with any shipper or other person to transport such traffic at any other or different rate than such as may be provided for in its schedules as filed and published according to law."

It has been suggested, in view of the recent decision in what is known as the "beef-trust case," that this injunction is too general to be enforcible. We think this suggestion is not well founded. The bill on which the injunction was issued, after setting forth the granting of lower than the published rates to favored shippers of grain and meats, charged in a separate paragraph (VIII) that the railway company was committing like offenses "on many other of the principal commodities constituting the bulk of railroad traffic between the States, comprising the ordinary necessities of life."

The order of injunction must, of course, be read in connection with the bill; and the general clause of the order therefore applies only to granting preferential rates on principal commodities comprising the necessities of life. The order is, therefore, not a general one directed at all possible violations of law, whether like the one specifically set forth or not, and in this respect differs from the general clause in the order in the beef-trust case.

Besides, the order in the latter case was considered on an appeal which subjected it to direct review. Here there has been no appeal, but the railway company has taken issue on all the averments of the bill, including Paragraph VIII.

Because of the decision in United States v. Missouri Pacific Railway Company (189 U. S., 274), the Government has taken the precaution to bring the present case within the provisions of the act of February 19, 1903, known as the "Elkins law." This was done by an order made May 8, 1903, continuing the injunction until further order of the court. Again there was no appeal, but the case stands at issue on the general as well as the specific charges made by the bill.

It is well settled that an order of injunction can not be reviewed indirectly by those charged with violating it. Jurisdiction of the subject and person granted, as it must be here, the only question that can be raised is that of disobedience.

We therefore recommend that the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company and all its principal officers and agents who had, during the period above named or any part thereof, power and authority over traffic agreements and freight rates, be arraigned for contempt of court in making and carrying out the above agreement with the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company shortly after the injunction was issued and continuing to carry it out after the injunction was reentered.

It may be found that some subordinate officers or agents should also be included. But this secret arrangement with the fuel company involved the carriage of hundreds of cars per month. The concessions from the established rates must have amounted to about a million dollars for the two and one-half years during which they were granted; and it is incredible that this scheme was devised and carried out by any authority but that of the chief officers of the railway company, who were in control of its traffic department. And it was the duty of each and all of these officers to see that the injunction was obeyed.

The proceeding for contempt seems to us the most ready and effective to be taken against the railroad company and its responsible officers. The abolition of imprisonment by the Elkins law does not apply to contempts, so that this penalty as well as a fine may be imposed if, in the judgment of the court, a case for such punishment be made out against any officer. At the same time the court has a much broader discretion than it would have in a strictly criminal proceeding to adapt its punishment to the degree of guilt in the case of each offender.

We think the object of Congress in providing a remedy by injunction in such cases, leaving the necessary penalties for disobedience to the discretion of the court, was to avoid the niceties of procedure and proof required in strictly criminal prosecutions and apply to railroad officials the remedy so often found effective in other cases.

We have not had as yet the time or means for making the investigations required for further recommendations. We shall proceed with all possible dispatch to make such examinations, and shall have the honor hereafter to make a further report.

Awaiting your instructions, we have the honor to be,
Your obedient servants,

JUDSON HARMON,
FREDERICK N. JUDSON.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, March 8, 1905.

Hon. JUDSON HARMON, Cincinnati, Ohio.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the letter of yourself and Mr. Judson, dated February 28, 1905, reporting the results of your consideration, up to that date, of the questions arising out of the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the matter of alleged unlawful rates and practices in the transportation of coal and mine supplies by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company.

I am very much gratified with the progress being made in the investigation, and upon the receipt of a final report I shall desire to arrange for another conference at Washington with yourself and Mr. Judson for the purpose of considering the action to be taken upon your joint recommendations.

Respectfully,

W. H. MOODY,
Attorney-General.

ST. PAUL BUILDING,
Cincinnati, Ohio, March 11, 1905.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant. We both understood our report to recommend proceedings in contempt in the suit of the United States against the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Company at Kansas City, without awaiting the result of future investigations with reference to other action against it or the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, its officers and agents. If, however, as we understand from your letter, you think it best not to take these proceedings in contempt until we shall have reported on the advisability of such further proceedings, we shall of course make our investigations and report as early as we can.

An examination of the record of the above case at Kansas City shows that on January 25 last Edgar P. Powell was appointed examiner to take testimony, leaving the time for so doing to be fixed by further order. It seems to us that the quickest and most effective way of getting the testimony desired will be to have an order directing the examiner to proceed at an early date to take the testimony. He will have authority to enforce the attendance of witnesses and require the production of books, papers, etc. He can sit at convenient points, and the consignees whose testimony we want can be brought before him with less inconvenience to them and all parties, and with greater facility, than before a grand jury where there might be some question as to our right to appear.

If you approve this course all that will be necessary will be for you to authorize us, or either of us, to appear for the Government. We can then have a further order made fixing the time, and arrange to proceed. I suggest that the authority be made alternative, because it may not be necessary for us both to appear at all times, and we might not both be able to do so. We should, of course, be in constant touch in the matter and should both appear when necessary.

We have the honor to be, with great respect,

Very truly, yours,

JUDSON HARMON,
FREDERICK N. JUDSON.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, March 21, 1905.

Hon. JUDSON HARMON, Cincinnati, Ohio.

SIR: The letter of yourself and Mr. Judson, dated the 11th instant, has just come to my attention, I having been out of the city when it was received. The plan there outlined for getting the testimony necessary to enable you and Mr. Judson to complete your investigation and report upon certain transactions between the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company and the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company commends itself to my judgment, and for the purpose of carrying it out, and in accordance with your suggestion, I hereby authorize you and Mr. Judson, or either of you, to appear before Examiner Edgar P. Powell, with full powers in the premises, and represent the United States in the matter of the taking of testimony in the case of the United States against the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, now pending at Kansas City.

Referring to the first paragraph of your letter, I wish to say that, unless in the opinion of yourself and Mr. Judson a different course would be to the greater advantage of the Government, I do prefer to have all of your and his recommendations before me before considering the question of the proper action to be taken against the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Company.

Respectfully,

W. H. MOODY,
Attorney-General.

ST. LOUIS, MO., March 20, 1905.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We beg to say that we have made informal investigations which confirm our previous reports. We can go no further without the use of process to secure formal evidence and other proof, and therefore again recommend contempt proceedings and the taking of testimony before the master appointed for that purpose in the case pending in the United States circuit court at Kansas City.

We have no doubt that the laws have been violated by the traffic officers of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Company and those of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company. The former have by the same acts violated the injunction in that case. The formal proof required to punish them for contempt of court, and also criminally, if it shall be thought best to do that, too, can be had only by judicial process. This is ready to our hands in the above-named case. The proof elicited before the master will also be available for criminal proceedings against the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company and its officers and agents.

As we have said, we can go no further, and need go no further, with informal investigations. We are convinced that the facts are as we have stated them, and it only remains to put the proof in legal form.

We beg, therefore, that this be considered our final report as to the recommendations for which we are asked, and await your further instructions.

We have the honor to be, your obedient servants,

JUDSON HARMON.
FREDERICK N. JUDSON.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, March 27, 1905.

Hon. JUDSON HARMON, Cincinnati, Ohio.

SIR: My letter of the 21st instant, in reply to the communication of yourself and Mr. Judson of the 11th instant, perhaps will serve as a reply to yours of the 20th instant. It gives the fullest authority to take testimony in the case now pending at Kansas City against the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe. It is believed by you, and I concur in that belief, that testimony thus elicited will serve to show with accuracy what acts have been committed which may be claimed to be in contempt of the injunction, by whom those acts were committed, and where the responsibility for them rests.

Before proceedings for contempt or criminal proceedings against either the railroad or the fuel company, or their officers or agents, are begun, I desire that all the material facts should be before the Department and that the Department should have the benefit of your advice upon them.

Very truly, yours,

W. H. MOODY,
Attorney-General.

ST. LOUIS, MO., April 11, 1905.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In view of the subjects discussed in our conferences at Washington last week, we think it is proper that our position with reference to our recommendations concerning the taking of testimony under the Commission at Kansas City should be formally stated.

We recommended in our letter of March 11 that we should be authorized to proceed with the taking of testimony at Kansas City, not so much with a view of procuring proof of the violation of the injunction as a basis of an attachment for contempt against the railroad company and its officers, as with the view of procuring detailed proof of unlawful shipments, so as to have a proper basis of proceeding under the criminal provisions of the Elkins Act against the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company and its officers.

Testimony taken before the master without filing contempt charges would necessarily be limited, under the established rules of procedure, to proof of the facts alleged in the bill, and proof of alleged violations of the injunction order since the filing of the bill would doubtless be objected to and excluded as irrelevant to the issue. If, however, a rule to show cause were issued against the railroad company and its officers, the master could be empowered to take evidence as to the complicity of the several parties charged with contempt. In the absence of such a rule, however, the testimony would clearly be limited to facts at and prior to the filing of the bill.

While proof of the detailed shipments is doubtless essential in any criminal prosecution under the act, such proof is not essential in an attachment for contempt for violation of the court's injunction. It is enough to show that the injunction has been violated, and the detailed proof of the daily shipments constituting distinct offenses would not be required. We are clearly of opinion that the report of the Commission, with the verified copy of the testimony before the Commission, would be a sufficient basis for an attachment in contempt against the corporation and its managing officers. Proof of the extent of the violation of the injunction would, however, be proper, in order to guide the court in fixing the penalty, so that the proof required for criminal prosecution could be obtained.

We have considered, at your suggestion, the advisability of attaching only the corporation, without including the managing officers, and we are of opinion that such a course would be against the interests of the Government. The corporation might plead guilty to what it would claim to have been a mere technical violation of law, and escape with a fine, thus in effect barring us against further steps against the individuals really guilty of violation of the court's order, as the door to further investigation would thus be closed. The real violation of the court's order is by the individual acting in their corporate relation, as has been uniformly recognized by the courts, and it is for that reason that injunction orders against corporations always run, as in this case, against their officers and agents also. (See 5 Thompson on Corporations, section 6450.)

It necessarily follows, therefore, that when there is proof of the violation of the court's order by a corporation defendant, some individuals are chargeable with the wrong, and they are presumably the officers in charge of the corporate business involved. We deem it of importance to the interests of the Government, and as a judicial precedent, that this principle of individual responsibility for corporate action should be insisted on as essential for the enforcement of the judicial power in this the first important case, wherein the remedy of injunction is enforced by the Government against a railroad company under the interstate-commerce act.

Respectfully,

JUDSON HARMON,
FREDERICK N. JUDSON.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, May 19, 1905.

GENTLEMEN: I have considered with the utmost care your letter of April 11. It has been submitted to the President and considered by him. I think I ought to state to you that in transmitting your letter to the President I said:

"I concur in much that is said in this letter. I have not, however, as yet been able to overcome my repugnance to proceeding individually against the officers of the railroad company for contempt of the injunction without some evidence with respect to every individual proceeded against that he had some culpable connection with the contempt of court."

In passing upon your recommendations I have not been unmindful of the great weight which is added to them by your personal and professional standing. Nor have I forgotten that you were invited to exercise the broadest discretion as to persons, as well as corporations, in dealing with the subject committed to you by this Department. Nevertheless I can not escape my responsibility by substituting the discretion of others for my own. If proceedings are taken against the corporation or individuals, they must be taken in my name and, what is infinitely more important, with the authority that belongs to the office which, for the time being, I hold. I am, therefore, brought face to face with my own personal and official responsibility and must discharge it under the embarrassing circumstance that one of the persons affected by my decision is a colleague in the performance of public duty. It is not easy to determine with accuracy what effect such a circumstance has upon the exercise of judgment. I can only say that I have endeavored to see that it should have no effect one way or the other.

The advice which you give is that an application should be made for an attachment for contempt of the injunction against the railroad company and its managing officers. There is no difference between us as to proceeding against the corporation itself. If the transactions set forth in the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission in regard to the departure from the published rates by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway system in favor of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company are within the terms of the injunction the evidence before the Commission shows with sufficient clearness that that injunction has been violated, and the railroad company has been guilty of contempt of court.

But you go further and recommend proceedings against the managing officers of that company, including, presumably, the president, the vice-president in charge of the traffic department, the general freight and traffic manager, and other officers whose duties relate to the transportation of freight, saying:

"We are clearly of opinion that the report of the Commission, with the verified copy of the testimony before the Commission, would be a sufficient basis for an attachment in contempt against the corporation and its managing officers."

I have examined this report and a transcript of the testimony taken by the Commission. I do not find any testimony relating to the conduct of any except minor officials, and Mr. Biddle, who may claim to have obtained immunity by testifying fully before the Commission. For instance, to be specific, there is not a syllable of testimony that Mr. Ripley, the president of the road, or Mr. Morton, then one of its vice-presidents, had any connection whatever with the departure from the published rates in favor of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, or that they knew or suspected that transportation was furnished to this company in any manner different from that prescribed by the open and published rate.

Neither of these officials was in the remotest way referred to in the testimony or in the report of the Commission. Surely it would not be contended that upon this state of facts these officials were subject to a penalty for contempt of court. Nor have I understood that it has been your opinion that upon such a state of facts any individuals would be liable to punishment for contempt. Your view, as I have understood it, has been that as corporations must always act through their officers and agents there is a presumption that those who are charged with the management of their affairs are responsible for the conduct of a corporation which violates an injunction; that that presumption warrants an accusation for contempt against its officers and agents where the corporation has been guilty of contempt, and that upon investigation of the accusation testimony may be taken which will show whether or not the officers accused have themselves been guilty of any conduct which has aided in bringing the corporation into contempt of court. I do not understand, however, that without such evidence you would be of opinion that any officer or agent would be liable to the penalty for contempt.

After great consideration, I am of the opinion that some evidence ought to precede the accusation and that an accusation so grave in its character ought not to be made unless there appears before it is made some evidence in support of it. I realize fully that I have the power to make the accusation and no one can question it. The possession of the power carries with it, however, the responsibility for its scrupulous exercise. In this case, upon the facts which I have stated, I have reached the conclusion that I ought not to make the application for an attachment for contempt against the officers of the railway company.

I have felt that it was due to you that you should receive an exact statement of the views which I entertain and the reasons which have controlled my action.

I have submitted the foregoing to the President and he authorizes me to say that he approves the conclusion which I have reached and directs that proceedings for contempt of the injunction be begun against the railroad company only.

Very respectfully,

W. H. MOODY,
Attorney-General.

Hon. JUDSON HARMON and FREDERICK N. JUDSON, Esq.,
Cincinnati, Ohio.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, June 5, 1905.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We have received and carefully considered your letter of 19th ultimo, and regret that you do not approve our recommendation of February 28 last, which we repeated with further reasons in our letter of April 11. We appreciate the very great weight to be given your conclusion, but we are deeply impressed with the gravity of the matter and its importance as a precedent. We feel therefore that we may, without impropriety, refer to some things in your letter.

It is true that the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission merely stated the facts which show that the law had been violated, without attempting to fix responsibility on any particular officers of the railroad company. The reason for this was that the Commission limited its inquiry to the mere fact of such violation, and so stated. (See testimony, p. 1341.)

The violation by a corporation of an injunction directed against it and its officers always calls for a rule against such of them as had control of its conduct to show cause why they should not be held personally responsible. They are prima facie guilty of disobedience. It was their duty to see that the acts forbidden were not done, as well as not to do them.

The necessity of this rule is apparent as well as its justice. The facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of such officers and of subordinates under their control. Except in cases so rare that they may be called accidental there are no means of discovering the facts except by such a proceeding as we have advised.

This well-established rule, which is sufficient to justify the action proposed in any case, seemed and still seems to us peculiarly to fit the case in hand. A rule against the controlling officers of the railroad company to show cause is simply the recognition by the court of the responsibility incident to their official relation. It is a demand for an explanation and not, properly speaking, an "accusation." The action of the corporation is necessarily presumptive evidence against its principal officers who had charge of the department in question.

We fully concur that no proceedings should be commenced without evidence, but facts presumed or judicially noticed are evidence. The proceeding we recommended is not unusual or exceptional, but, on the contrary, is the natural and ordinary one in such cases.

What we have said is peculiarly true of the great corporations of our day. They can not be imprisoned and punishment by fine is not only inadequate, but reaches the real culprits only lightly, if at all. The evils with which we are now confronted are corporate in name, but individual in fact. Guilt is always personal. So long as officials can hide behind their corporations no remedy can be effective. When the Government searches out the guilty men and makes corporate wrongdoing mean personal punishment and dishonor the laws will be obeyed.

Your opinion always commands great respect, which is by no means due to your office alone, and we appreciate the deep sense of official responsibility which you express, but the nature and circumstances of our appointment impose a certain independent responsibility upon us which we feel would not be met by a proceeding against the corporation alone.

We therefore consider that we have now discharged the duty which you did us the honor to intrust to us, and thanking you most sincerely for your constant courtesy and consideration, we remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

JUDSON HARMON.
FREDERICK N. JUDSON.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, June 12, 1905.

Hon. JUDSON HARMON and FREDERICK N. JUDSON, Esq.,
Cincinnati, Ohio.

GENTLEMEN: I have received and carefully considered your letter of the 5th instant. While the difference of opinion which has arisen between us is upon what might be termed an "interlocutory" part of the case, nevertheless you have regarded it as so vital and fundamental as to prevent you from proceeding further in the investigation, consideration, and action concerning the rebates given by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company to the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company.

I regret your conclusion, but not doubting that you have arrived at it after great consideration, inspired by a sense of your duty, I must accept it.

I was impressed with the fact that the investigation of the subject made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, while doubtless adequate for its purposes, was insufficient for the purposes of the Department of Justice. To what extent shipments of coal made under the rate not published were subject to the control of the Federal Government and within the provisions of the interstate-commerce law was not made at all clear by the report of the Commission. Moreover, having especial reference to the restraining order of the circuit court of Missouri, that report leaves it quite uncertain what, if any, of such transportation was between the States, the restraining order being by its terms directed against transportation "between the States." Still further, the report of the Commission and the testimony taken before it are silent as to individual responsibility or culpability, dealing, as you say, with "the facts which show that the law had been violated, without attempting to fix responsibility on any particular officers of the railroad company."

I had hoped that you would find it practicable to elicit further and more specific information, at least in the respects above mentioned, before determining upon the character of the proceedings to be taken for the vindication of the law. I have believed that this information should precede action and that action should be based upon it rather than upon inferences to be drawn from the Commission's report or the presumed responsibility of the officers of a corporation for its acts.

I fully appreciate the weight of the reasons which, though they have not convinced me, have led you to a contrary conclusion. In accepting your resignation permit me to assure you of my high personal regard.

Very respectfully,

W. H. MOODY,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, May 31, 1905.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before you my views concerning the proceedings for contempt which have been under consideration on account of the granting of certain rebates by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company to the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in an opinion rendered February 1, 1905, decided that the railway company had continuously granted such rebates for five years and that this had been accomplished by deducting from the published rate for transportation the price of the coal shipped, paying that price to the mining company. How far this practice concerns itself with interstate commerce and is in violation of law need not now be considered. It is enough to say that, according to the opinion of the Commission, some part of it was in violation of law. It is suggested in the opinion of the Commission that, since the granting of the restraining order hereinafter referred to, the giving of these rebates was in contempt of that order. I therefore invite your attention to the suit in which the restraining order was granted and to the terms of the order itself.

The United States, in March, 1902, exhibited its bill in equity against the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, in which it was set forth that the defendant was a common carrier engaged in interstate transportation, had transported packing-house products, dressed meats, and grain at less than the published established rates on such commodities, paying to the shippers the difference in the form of rebates, and that unlawful rebates, preferential rates, and facilities were granted by the defendant "on many other of the principal commodities constituting the bulk of railroad traffic between the States, comprising the ordinary necessities of life."

The bill prayed for an injunction against the transportation except at the published rates of packing-house products, dressed meats, grain, and the products of grain, or "any traffic transported by said defendant over its railroad," and against the giving of rebates in respect of such transportation.

On March 25, 1902, the court issued a restraining order in substance as follows:

"The defendant, its officers, agents, and servants, and each and every of them, be, and they and each of them are hereby, enjoined and restrained from further acting under and enforcing, or executing in any manner whatever, any agreement to transport over the defendant's railroad or any part thereof, between the States, any packing-house products, dressed meats, grain, or the products of grain, or any other interstate traffic, at any greater or less rate than the rates named for such services in defendant's established schedule in force on its lines and at the time said traffic is transported on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission; or in any way departing from their schedule rates in carrying any of said above products or traffic between the States; and they, and each of them, are enjoined from hereafter agreeing with any shipper or other person to transport such traffic at any other or different rate than such as may be provided for in its schedules as filed and published according to law; and they and each of them are enjoined and restrained from paying any rebates or making any concession whatever in defendant's rates and charges whereby any such traffic transported by said defendant over its railroad, or in respect to any traffic in the transportation of which said defendant may participate, shall be carried by it, in whole or in part, at any rate different from the established rate at the time such traffic shall be transported then on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission, as provided by law."

For present purposes it may be asumed that the transportation of coal at less than the published rates is in contempt of this restraining order and that the corporation which has engaged in such transportation is liable to the penalties of contempt. If this be so, any officer of the corporation who brought about, or consented with knowledge to this departure from the published rate, ought to be proceeded against individually for contempt.

But I do not believe that proceedings ought to be begun against officers of the corporation until some evidence is forthcoming that they did, either by act or connivance, have some relation to the guilty conduct. Mr. Ripley was the president of the railway company during all the time the transactions referred to occurred, and Mr. Morton, a member of your cabinet, during a part of the time was one of its vice-presidents, and among his duties was the management of the freight traffic of the system. I do not find a scintilla of evidence taken before the Interstate Commerce Commission which tends to show that either of these officials had the slightest connection with the misconduct complained of or any knowledge whatever of its existence. When it is considered that the graveman of the offense is the transportation of coal without the publication of the rate at which it was transported, and further considered that the rate schedules of a great railway system are very numerous, it seems to me unjust in the extreme that an accusation of contempt of court should be made in the condition of the evidence which I have described.

Very respectfully,

W. H. MOODY,
Attorney-General.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 12, 1905.

SIR: I have received and carefully considered your letter of the 31st ultimo. I entirely agree with your conclusions. In my opinion you would be wholly without justification in proceeding individually against the officers of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway for contempt when neither the Interstate Commerce Commission nor the special counsel you have employed have developed a single fact of any kind beyond the holding of their offices tending to implicate any one of these officers. One of the officers, Mr. Morton, is a member of my Cabinet. This fact is not to be allowed to shield him, nor, on the other hand, is it to be allowed to cause him to be singled out, or the officers with whom he is associated to be singled out, for attack.

At about the same time that the injunction was obtained against the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe an injunction was obtained against several other western railroads. Subsequently it was developed by the Interstate Commerce Commission that under the guise of a division of rates, unlawful rebates were given by these railroads to the International Harvester Company, just as a rebate was given by the Atchison in the case of the Colorado Fuel Company. Upon attention being called to the cases by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the unlawful practice was abandoned in the Harvester case, as it was abandoned in this case of the Colorado Fuel Company. The two cases stand precisely on a par. No one has suggested, and as far as I am aware no one has thought of suggesting, that we should proceed individually against the officers of the roads engaged in this International Harvester Company affair; yet the case is exactly parallel to this Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe case, and if such action as you have refused to take was taken against the officers of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad, it would also have to be taken in the case of the International Harvester Company against the officers of every railroad running west of Chicago. There is, of course, no possible excuse for discriminating one case from the other.

You advised me to direct the submission of the printed evidence taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission (the only evidence before the special counsel) to Judge Phillips, who had issued the injunction, to see whether on this published evidence, in which there is not a syllable directly bearing on Mr. Morton or any one of his colleagues in the management of the road, action could be taken against any one of them personally. I did not take this advice for two reasons: First, if it were not for Mr. Morton being in my Cabinet, neither you nor I would dream of following such a course in this instance; and we could not follow it save on condition of also following it in the case of the Harvester Company and all similar cases, which, in my judgment, would put us in a wholly untenable position. Second, I have received from Mr. Morton a letter, of which I inclose you a copy, together with a copy of my reply. In it you will see that Mr. Morton not only states in the most unequivocal manner that he had no knowledge whatever of the unlawful practice complained of, but also shows by the quotation of documents issued under his direction, that all such unlawful practices were specifically forbidden by him, and that the attention of his subordinates was repeatedly called to the necessity of complying with the law in this respect. When there is thus not one shadow of testimony against him, and when whatever evidence has been submitted shows explicitly that he is not guilty, it seems to me that there is no warrant whatever for our proceeding against him.

The course that you have followed in dealing with all these corporation matters has been coherent and resolute and has had my heartiest approval. The aim of the Administration has been in the first place to stop the unlawful practices. We have not proceeded personally against any of the officers unless there was legal evidence showing that their conduct had been willfully of such a nature as to render it our duty to try to punish them personally no less than to try to put an end to the objectionable practices. You perhaps remember that when the Administration brought the Northern Securities suit there was much criticism of us for not undertaking criminal proceedings against the principal directors in the Northern Securities Corporation. The view of the Administration at that time was that such a proceeding would be unjust to the men concerned and not to the advantage of the public. Events have, I think, shown this view to be correct. In the same way, when a year or two ago injunctions were obtained against the corporations known popularly as the Beef Trust, no effort was made at the time to proceed personally against the individuals in those corporations. Since then testimony has been offered us to show that the packing companies have violated this injunction and that the violation was deliberate and willful on the part of a number of individuals.

On the weight and sufficiency of this evidence it is not for me to judge. With my approval the Department of Justice, with the assistance of the Department of Commerce and Labor, has for some months been endeavoring to find out whether or not they can obtain legal evidence of such willful and deliberate violation of the injunction by any individual. If the grand jury now sitting in Chicago find indictments against any individuals connected with the packing corporations, it will be because in their judgment such legal evidence of the violation of the injunction has been laid before them. If you at any time get legal evidence of any such willful and deliberate violation by any officer of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe or of any other railroad running west of Chicago, of the injunction in the Colorado Fuel case, or of the injunction in the International Harvester Company case, you will of course proceed as you have already proceeded in the Chicago beef-packing cases. But at present not only has there been no such evidence produced, but there has been no attempt to produce such evidence; and as regards Mr. Morton, there is seemingly conclusive testimony to the contrary. You will not, however, take action against any official of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad which you do not take against the official of any other railroad under precisely similar circumstances.

In both this Colorado Fuel case and in the International Harvester case I direct that proceedings for contempt against the companies be taken by the Government. Whether, as the cases develop, proceeding against individual officers become necessary must depend in each instance upon whether testimony is obtained showing that such individual officer has, either by act or connivance, been personally guilty in the matter. If there are any railroads guilty of the practices which we have enjoined other railroads from following, but which have not themselves been enjoined, proceeding should be begun to put them under similar restraint.

You have expressed your doubt as to whether the injunction granted is in sufficiently explicit terms to cover either the case of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe or the similar case of the International Harvester Company. I agree, however, with your feeling that even though there is such doubt, an effort should be made to obtain the judgment of the court on the question.

Sincerely, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. WILLIAM H. MOODY,
Attorney-General.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I listened with much attention and with interest, which was shared by everyone present, to the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. Its opening sentence, as I understood it, was of great significance. He said the present Administration marked the coming of the American people into their own. If this be a correct statement of his language, I venture to say he exaggerates slightly the actual conditions. The present Administration does not mark the coming of the people into their own; but I think the President's message shows how they can be brought into their own, and that explains the applause which greeted it on Friday [applause on the Democratic side], and which, beginning on this side, became so infectious that it finally extorted concurrence and support from that side [laughter], so that as the reading proceeded this House, judged by its manifestations, was unanimous in praising the doctrine expounded in that remarkable document.

Mr. Chairman, I may be pardoned if I bestow a moment's notice on that part of the gentleman's speech which was its main burden. He said that all important measures which during the last forty years have found their way into the statute books of the country were exclusively of Republican origin—that Democrats sometimes supported them, but never originated any of them. Mr. Chairman, I dispute the accuracy of that statement, and I go further. I am sorry the gentleman from Michigan is not present, but I see in their seats on the other side some excellent historians who are abundantly able to vindicate every plausible claim of the Republican party to credit for public service of any kind, and in the presence of these competent and vigilant critics I venture the assertion that from the very first establishment of this Government there never has been a policy permanently incorporated into our political system that was not of Democratic origin. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] The country has often rejected Democratic candidates, but it has never accepted a measure vitally affecting the structure or development of our Government that was not either recommended by a Democratic President, enacted by a Democratic Congress, or proposed by a Democratic convention. Even the legislation of the last fifty years has been an enforcement of Democratic policies by Republican politicians. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman himself, in attempting to prove his proposition, has cited several instances where individual members of his party suggested valuable reforms, but each one, if it establish anything, shows that every Republican patriot who attempted to embody patriotism in legislation always ran up against opposition immovable as a stone wall when both Houses of Congress were dominated by the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Whenever he cited a remedial measure actually passed, it was one enacted either under a Democratic Administration or by a Democratic Congress, or else it had its source in a Democratic platform. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, to justify this statement, we need but a brief glance at the salient features of our history since the beginning of this Government with the inauguration of Washington.

The first political division of the American people was between those who accepted the teachings of Jefferson on one side and Hamilton on the other. The issue between them was decided by the people in 1800, when Jefferson was elected President. From that hour the tendency of this nation has been toward a democratic republic, as under the Administration of Adams, had he been reelected, and the influence of Hamilton it must have been toward what was styled a "strong," which meant an oligarchical government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The chief feature of Jefferson's Administration was the Louisiana Purchase, constituting the Democratic policy of expansion—an expansion involving the spread of our authority over lands where the American flag will typify for all time that the American Constitution is the possession of every inhabitant. [Loud applause.]

This wise policy of Jefferson, by which valuable contiguous territory was secured through peaceful negotiations to avoid war with France, has been perverted under a Republican Administration to the conquest by violence of worthless lands on the other side of the globe and the purchase of men for $20,000,000 in the Philippine Islands. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Here we see the painful results that follow when enforcement of Democratic principles is intrusted to Republican officials. The Democratic policy of expansion executed by Democrats can be judged by the Louisiana purchase; the same policy intrusted to Republican hands by the Philippine experiment—one resulting in a new territorial possession glorious in extent, in character, and in results; the other in a wretched adventure of which you yourselves are so heartily sick and ashamed that you are ready to blame on Providence now the follies, or worse, of your own politicians. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Was the Monroe Doctrine of Republican origin? And yet it is a principle more frequently invoked by Republican statesmen of late years—and I may add more extensively misapplied—than any other with which I am familiar.

But perhaps you will tell me that the Republican party is at least entitled to credit for having first asserted the indestructibility of our Federal compact and for having maintained the Union through the stress and difficulties of civil war. Even that claim I dispute. Where was the principle first formulated that this Federal Union of States is not a compact from which any of them might withdraw at pleasure, but a Government entitled to exercise every power necessary for the maintenance of its existence even to the extent of using force against a State that undertook to disrupt it by secession? Was it in the speech of a Republican politician or in any platform of a Republican convention? No, sir; that doctrine is first expounded fully and completely in the proclamation issued by Andrew Jackson in 1832 or 1833, and he never failed to embody Democratic principles in his every utterance. [Applause on the Democratic side.] To Jackson's statement of the grounds on which the Federal Union must be held indestructible nothing has ever been added. All that the strongest Republican Administration accomplished in this respect was to enforce by arms the principles first laid down by a Democratic President. And the war to save the Union was not the policy of a party, but a patriotic movement of the whole people. It is true that Republican politicians controlled the Government during the years of our civil conflict, but it is equally true that Democratic patriots manned the Union Army. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Republicans obtained the offices and secured the contracts; Democrats filled the regiments, bore the fatigues of long marches, the perils of desperate battles, the losses of property, sharing all the sacrifices that were the price of maintaining the Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, sir, when the war was over, when the last battle to save the Union had been fought and won, when the last hostile soldier had laid down his arms, when the smoke of conflict had cleared from the southern fields, by what policy was reconstruction of the South accomplished? Was it according to the policy of punishment, penalties, proscription proposed by the Republican politicians—the Thad. Stevenses, the Butlers—which, if it had been adopted, would have sown seeds of deep injury, inevitably ripening into bitter crops of resentment, hate, and very probably renewed resistance. No, sir; the reconstruction finally adopted was based on the policy of pacification by plenary pardon, which Democrats advocated and which in the last analysis merely embodied the terms of surrender prescribed by Grant to Lee. Democrats insisted that the South was not to be treated as conquered territory, to be pillaged, oppressed, garrisoned; her patriots to be prosecuted; her leaders to be fined, exiled, imprisoned, hanged, but that she must be welcomed back as an estranged sister to the sisterhood of States, without condition or disqualification, her hands not bound in shackles, but left free to repair the waste of war, while her head reposed securely on the generous bosom of a reunited country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And, sir, never has a policy been vindicated so promptly and gloriously. The men who had sustained heroically in many battlefields the right of a State to secede within ten years after their defeat rejoiced with the victors over the triumph of the Union. And to-day there are no more valiant upholders of the Union, no truer friends of the Constitution, than the descendants of the heroes who wore the gray in that Titanic conflict. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not believe the gentleman from Michigan will deny that final reconstruction of the Union was accomplished according to the Democratic policy of conciliation or express regret that the Republican policy of proscription was abandoned before the indignant protest of American manhood, American justice, and American virtue voiced by the Democratic party. [Applause.] And so, Mr. Chairman, coming down to present times and actual conditions, while the gentleman from Michigan may find some analogy between the language of the President's message read here last Friday and a few isolated expressions of some Republican leaders, I do not think he will pretend that anything of similar or kindred import can be found in any platform or official declaration of political principles ever adopted by any Republican convention. But, sir, however this may be, even conceding for the sake of argument that there may be ground for dispute about the sources from which certain meritorious legislation proceeded, there can be no differences of opinion whatever concerning the sources of the abuses these measures were intended to remedy. Of this the speech delivered by the gentleman from Michigan to-day furnishes conclusive proof. I ask your attention once more to his opening sentence: "The President's Administration marks the coming of the people into their own."

When were they ousted from their own? [Applause on the Democratic side.] None will dispute that these sinister conditions amounting to an ouster of the American people from their birthright are a growth of the last ten years, and that surely has been a period of undivided Republican ascendency. Abuses which have grown up while Republican control has been undisputed are abuses for which the party can not escape responsibility. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, sir, I must not myself follow the example of the gentleman from Michigan in occupying the time of the House with discussions of historical rather than practical interest. We are not here to establish the truth of history, but to deal with living questions. The people are not much concerned about the source of a policy, but deeply concerned about its value. They do not care whence a valuable suggestion comes, but very much whither it tends. It matters little whether you gentlemen on that side or we on this were reluctant in the past to support meritorious measures, but it is vitally important to know how far you are willing to go with us now in redressing wrongs, the gravity of which the President's message makes clear, the existence of which nobody denies.

That message raises a question far more serious than the one discussed by the gentleman from Michigan, or by the eloquent gentleman who has just preceded me [Mr. SHERWOOD].

I do not now refer to the first part of it dealing with conditions which are deplorable, but for which no adequate remedies are suggested. For my part, I do not believe the head of a State is ever very impressive while he is describing difficulties without showing how they can be surmounted. To declare the existence of abuses while failing to recommend suitable means of reform is to discredit the Government by confessing its incapacity to discharge one of its primary and essential functions. But, sir, after we pass that portion of the message which deals with Mr. Ripley, of the Atchison road, and his peculiar performances, we reach a statement of conditions and a declaration of purpose which everybody on this side joined in applauding so vigorously that finally you gentlemen on the other side reached the point of applauding it yourselves. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What was the purport of this declaration which evoked universal approval, spontaneous and enthusiastic on this side, somewhat belated but ultimately not without vigor on that side? It is all summarized in one paragraph. Here it is:

> I do not for a moment believe that the actions of this Administration have brought on business distress. So far as this is due to local and not world-wide causes and to the actions of any particular individuals, it is due to the speculative folly and flagrant dishonesty of a few men of great wealth, who seek to shield themselves from the effects of their own wrongdoing by ascribing its results to the actions of those who have sought to put a stop to the wrongdoing. But if it were true that to cut out rottenness from the body politic meant a momentary check to an unhealthy seeming prosperity, I would not for one moment hesitate to put the knife to the corruption.

These words, sir, raise a question that goes not merely to the credit due any party or any man for having originated remedial measures, not merely to the prosperity of this people, not merely to the security of this Republic, but to the very existence of civilized government everywhere. In the last analysis this language amounts merely to a declaration that the President will obey his oath of office and enforce the law of the land under all circumstances, against all offenders, for the protection of all citizens. That declaration, which ordinarily would pass for a commonplace, assumes very grave significance in view of the effect that it has produced on the country. What is the effect? Has it awakened on every side unstinted applause? Can it be possible that there are any elements in this country outside of the penitentiaries who would interpret such a declaration of the Chief Magistrate as a threat against their interests or against the securities of their property? Surely, Mr. Chairman, if we were told that somewhere on this globe there is a country where men prominent in mercantile affairs, in the professions, in journalism, aye, in judicial life, administering the chief enterprises, controlling the largest capital, employing the greatest number of wageworkers, wielding the mightiest influences, interpreted a solemn declaration by the head of their Government that law would be enforced universally and justice done impartially as an assault upon credit and a blight upon industry, would we not be prompt to declare such a community must be incurably corrupt, hopelessly rotten, a reproach to humanity, and a peril to civilization? And yet, sir, that is precisely the attitude taken by many—practically all—of the most prominent financiers in this country of ours. Do I exaggerate? Let me read from one of their leading newspaper organs, voicing presumably the sentiments of its subscribers, or, at least, of its advertisers. I hold in my hand a copy of the New York Sun, dated February 2. Let me read the first article on its editorial column:

The business of New York and of the United States is not all done in Wall street. The financial institutions, the custodians of accumulated wealth, and the traders in investments, the great railroad and industrial corporations are not the only interests that have reason for the most serious concern at this time. The merchants and manufacturers of the country, the smaller firms and partnerships, the individuals engaged in the old-fashioned way in one or another of those myriad forms of productive or commercial activity which in the aggregate constitute the major and most potent part of what is known as American "business"—what are they thinking to-day of the document they read yesterday with amazement and profound apprehension? It would be interesting to know. In former times of peril their initiative for self-protection and for patriotic purpose has been intelligent, prompt, and effective. What precautions are they taking or contemplating in the present situation? Is it really twelve years—it seems but yesterday—since these merchants and business men, in all quarters of the land, having been aroused by the menace of Bryanism, were organizing without regard to previous partisanship for the defense of the interests of honest business against the assaults of the most dangerous demagogue our politics had then produced?

Here we have a declaration in unmistakable terms that the President's message is an assault on property so outrageous that owners of property are open to criticism because they are not organizing to protect themselves against the policy outlined in it.

To-day that same paper publishes another editorial of even still more sinister import. Omitting the personal references to individuals, so as to avoid making the RECORD a vehicle for circulating libels, I will read that part which shows the editor's conception of the effect produced by the President's words. The article is headed, "Dansons la Carmagnole," signifying "Let us dance the Carmagnole," and it says:

The whole Pacific coast, including the San Francisco sand lots, throbs and palpitates with ecstasy.

The boycott looks up again. The "scab" betakes him to the tangled bush. A livelier iris breaks upon the burnished walking delegate.

From far and near the clans assemble. Down with capital! Down with property! Let us join the Carmagnole!

Now, conceive the full significance of this publication. Everybody here, of course, remembers that the Carmagnole was the measure of maddened fury danced by the Parisian mobs around tumbrils laden with men and women rolling slowly and painfully through the streets toward the guillotine, that misdirected altar of popular sovereignty on which victims of popular distrust were immolated in great numbers every day, drenching the soil of France with some of her best blood, shed avowedly as a sacrifice to the public safety, but really as a mad libation to anarchy and terror. And we are told now that this message proclaiming on the part of the President nothing but a determination to enforce the law with strict impartiality against all forms of dishonesty is an incitement to riot, tumult, and bloodshed; an invitation to mobs that they join in dissipating capital, ruining property, blighting prosperity, all to the mad whirl of the Carmagnole.

Sir, that statement is highly portentous. It is virtually a declaration that rottenness is a condition of prosperity, and a notification to the American people that enforcement of the law by public authorities against crimes of the greatest magnitude will so disturb the course of commerce that ruin will be precipitated on our industry, panic and desolation will be set loose over the country.

Sir, when this Congress met last December I cherished strong hopes that the President of the United States would have accepted on behalf of law, justice, order, and morality that insolent challenge of the forces that are really responsible for the ruin of our industrial prosperity. I hoped that he would say in unmistakable terms to the Congress, and through the Congress to the country: "The men who themselves are really responsible for the panic having undertaken to dictate the terms on which they will suffer prosperity to be restored, and these terms being not merely immunity from prosecution, but silence on the part of public officers concerning their offenses, I answer that I will give them neither. The people must judge between these men, who demand that the law be suspended in favor of criminals when their crimes are stupendous, and the magistrate, who, believing his oath of office leaves him no discretion, will enforce the law against all offenders with absolute impartiality. If prosperity must indeed be builded upon corruption among financiers, I will not suffer it to be maintained by perjury, for corruption can survive only through perjury of officers sworn to do battle against it in the name of law and the justice which law embodies." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I confess, sir, that the President's message received here on the opening of the session disappointed these hopes and filled me with the gravest apprehension. It did seem at the time as if the champion of right had shrunk at the critical moment from encountering the forces of corruption, appalled by the calamities which these agencies of evil had brought upon the country. Sir, had the President indeed abandoned his attitude of enforcing the law at the behest of offenders against the law, the consequences must have been appalling. It would have been equivalent to surrendering control of government to the very criminals government is organized to pursue, punish, exterminate. Such a calamity could have portended to the country nothing but disorders, discredit, and ever-recurring disasters. I feel justified now in taking the floor to congratulate the country because all danger that corruption and violence might triumph over law has been dispelled wholly and completely by the message of Friday. [Applause.]

If it were indeed true that a declaration by the President of a fixed purpose to obey his oath of office and enforce the law regardless of consequences had produced the panic, we would be face to face with a very grave question. We must decide between maintaining industrial prosperity by a sacrifice of justice and maintaining the moral law at a sacrifice of material interests. Were the people of the United States actually reduced to such a choice, I do not believe they would hesitate for a moment to decide by overwhelming majorities in favor of maintaining morality and justice, whatever the cost. But, sir, there is no such alternative. Obedience to the moral law and enjoyment of material prosperity are not alternatives. They are one and the same condition. The widest industrial prosperity can be reached only by the strictest observance of law based on justice and right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This panic has not been caused by exposure of wrong, but by perpetration of it. It has been caused, sir, not by anything the President has said or done, but by the criminal practices of his detractors and critics, not by any doubt about our currency or about the policy of our Government, but by grave doubts about the honesty with which the largest business enterprises are administered. And this widespread distrust was justified by successive revelations of depravity in high places of the financial world. It began with exposures of extensive corruption in the management of insurance companies. Was the President responsible either for the perpetration of these crimes or the circumstances that uncovered them? Is it not true that these rotten conditions were of long standing and that they became public through quarrels of the plunderers over distribution of the loot? The people, startled at the enormity of these crimes, were still more deeply shocked to find that nobody has ever been punished or even seriously pursued. Prosecuting officers have appeared able to discover nothing but obstacles in the pathway of justice. Not one has unsheathed the sword or smitten a single offender. Instead of being called to answer for their crimes in the criminal courts, these miscreants are still occupying the very places they have violated—controlling the very corporations whose treasuries they have plundered. Revelations of rottenness in the management of insurance companies were followed by exposures of darker depravities in other great corporations. Many concerns were investigated and every one appeared to have been managed in utter contempt of common honesty.

The spectacle of all these violators of the law enjoying immunity from prosecution and continuing to occupy the places they have abused has worked a sense of helplessness and hopelessness among the people in the last degree depressing to commerce.

When a great railway was found to have delivered practically an entire monopoly of the coal traffic in New York Harbor to a single concern—stock of that concern being held by officers of the railway company to whom it had been given for nothing—and the railroad president on his return from Europe, where he had been taking a vacation, told a newspaper reporter he had come home "to do some house cleaning" that statement was accepted as a rather handsome tribute to justice. So dulled had the public conscience itself become by the spectacle of unpunished crime in the administration of the very largest enterprises that never once did it seem to dawn upon anyone—publicist or prosecutor, journalist or politician—that, instead of being suffered to "do some house cleaning" in the corporation which he had pillaged, he should have been sent to do some cell cleaning in the penitentiary which he had deserved. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Finally, toward the close of last year in the city of New York, the local transportation companies, operating the most profitable franchise in the whole world, were investigated by a public utilities commission, and such a condition of rottenness was laid bare that they went into the hands of receivers on their own application. The only reason that could be given for their collapse was that even the great revenues derived from the enormously profitable franchise they enjoyed were not sufficient to satisfy the rapacity of the thieves who dominated the companies, much less yield a penny for dividends to stockholders. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, that statement has been repeated in the newspapers for a long time, and no one has questioned it. Yet, while the truth of it is undeniable, nobody is prosecuted. Nay, more, these enterprising financiers, when their rapacities had exhausted the treasuries of the transit companies and their credit, when there was nothing more left to steal, did not even withdraw from the management of the enterprises they had looted. They still control the bankrupt concerns brought to ruin by their crimes. And how has this been accomplished? By defying the courts, or at least by deceiving the judges, you will say. Not at all. Neither by evading nor defying the courts, but by openly making use of the courts to promote their sinister purposes. These wrongdoers did not fly from justice, fearing its sword, but they actually enter a court of justice, not to suffer punishment or to offer reparation, but to obtain from the court a further lease of authority over the very corporations they had ruined by open and flagrant robberies. Let me state what actually happened, from the record, then this House can judge for itself the fairness of this description.

A friendly creditor—there is no denial of his friendship—brought suit against the company operating the street railways upon a claim for debt, not in the State court—they did not like the atmosphere there—but in the United States court, which assumed jurisdiction on the ground that the plaintiff was a resident of another State, and then this remarkable spectacle was exhibited to investors and citizens generally. The debtor shows no apprehensions of the proceedings instituted against him. On the contrary he meets the pursuing creditor by appointment before the judge, the debt is confessed, and together they walk out of court with an order appointing two receivers of the property so absolutely agreeable all around that every one of the officials operating the transit system while the thieves controlled it were at once reemployed, and they remain in control of it at this hour with one single exception. The president of the concern, who was employed as general manager by the receiver, finding the climate of New York unpropitious to his health—subpœnaes were thicker than microbes in the air at that time—left the State, and before crossing the border into Connecticut he offered his resignation, and the receivers accepted it in a correspondence calculated to leave an impression that the parting was with high regard on both sides.

In the light of all these revelations—sinister, sordid, shocking—is it any wonder that distrust became widespread as to the value of corporate stocks? No one doubted the capacity of industrial enterprises in this country to earn large revenues, but many men doubted, and with good reason, whether the earnings, however large, would be suffered to reach the stockholders, or be stolen by dishonest officials. Under the influence of such doubts, stocks and bonds were forced on the market in enormous volume. When it was found that the same men who had perpetrated these enormities against industrial and transportation companies were also in control of the largest financial institutions, the banks became subjects of doubt and distrust. Was it not inevitable that investors who had sold securities, because they could not trust the honesty of men administering great corporations, would hesitate to trust the proceeds of these sales to banks controlled by the very same men? Withdrawals of deposits from banks and hoarding of moneys in secret places were inevitable results of such conditions. But hoarding always involves loss of interest and risk of greater loss. No man hoards from choice. Withdrawing his money from banks is virtually withdrawing from business, and this no man is willing to do except through fear of greater loss. Last year business men had good reason to fear that their funds deposited in banks might be lost in wild speculation or stolen outright. Driven to choose between loss of interest if they withdrew their deposits and loss of both principal and interest by swindling if they left their moneys in bank, they accepted the partial rather than risk the total loss of both principal and interest.

While deposits were thus being reduced one very large bank closed its doors, and soon afterwards nine, ten, or eleven other banking institutions suspended.

Bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, not one of these banks failed through some error of judgment on the part of their officers. Every one of them was ruined by practices that amounted to crime. It was notorious that the closed concerns had extensive alliances, and as suspicion naturally extended to other banks, long lines of depositors formed before the paying-teller's windows urgently demanding their funds. As fears spread that runs might become general, emergency measures were hastily taken by all the banks, which soon culminated in panic.

How was this condition met? Was it by publicity? Was full light turned at once on all banking conditions, the rottenness of unsound banks admitted, and the solvency of sound ones made clear, conspicuous, and unquestionable? No, sir. Popular distrust was met by universal suppression of every fact by which the people could learn for themselves what the conditions actually were.

The banks seemed to believe that confidence could be restored only by wrapping their own operations in impenetrable mystery. The newspapers lent themselves energetically to this general policy of mystification. They suppressed mention of every fact likely to shed any light on the actual condition of affairs. The word went round that the way to make all things right was to shout that they were right and to abuse anyone who expressed a doubt or even ventured a question. They ceased to publish the credit and debit accounts of each bank at the clearing house. Events that could not be suppressed wholly were misrepresented radically. Some banks, being unable to meet their debit balances at the clearing house, thereupon all the banks suspended payment by agreement amongst themselves. And this was proclaimed in the press as a marvelous display of financial soundness.

Mr. Dooley described the situation admirably when he said in one of his inimitable articles that the restoration of confidence was being prosecuted heroically under the inspiring cry of "Shut up." [Laughter and applause.]

Into this atmosphere of doubt and mystification I had hoped the President would turn the wholesome light of publicity by ordering every bank to make a report of its liabilities and resources, stating the stocks, bonds, or other property against which loans had been made. Such a showdown would have dispelled at once all doubts and all uncertainties about the actual financial situation. The people would then have been able to decide for themselves which were sound and which were rotten.

Whatever conditions might have been disclosed, the people would have faced them once they understood them. A few concerns that had managed to keep open might have been forced to close their doors, a few more financiers might have come to grief, but the people would at once have set about overcoming the obstacles in their pathway, which would have ceased to be insurmountable the moment they had ceased to be mysterious. Within thirty days the work of reparation would have been under full headway. Prosperity as we have known it has probably receded into the distance, but the march toward it would long since have begun. But the financiers have been allowed to deal with the situation as they pleased. The policy of suppression and mystification and silence remains in full force. Open violent runs on banks have indeed ceased, but distrust has not been allayed, confidence has not been restored, the panic has not been ended. The theater of its violent manifestations has merely been shifted from a few concerns of doubtful solvency to the body of the community where men engaged in legitimate business will for a long time continue to be its victims.

Why was that policy pursued? What was its object? Simply to prevent a few rotten concerns—not merely banks, but certain stock-speculating houses whose names were bandied freely through the streets—from going into bankruptcy. The financiers succeeded, but how? By diverting capital which should have been available for the legitimate operations of commerce to maintaining these worthless concerns in operation. Great industrial companies like Westinghouse could not secure discounts necessary to their business at any bank. All the resources of the banks having been employed to keep going these worthless, unproductive, speculative enterprises, not a penny could be obtained for legitimate productive enterprises. And this diversion of capital from its natural function of stimulating wholesome production to shielding fraud and crime from their natural consequences was justified and even made the subject of praise, because it was said that had these bucket shops been allowed to fail the stock exchange itself must have suspended. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This is not my explanation. It is the statement by which the authors of this policy justified it; and so, sir, the service actually rendered by the financiers who claimed credit for having ended the panic is that the great business houses of the country have been embarrassed in order that gambling houses might be restored to prosperity. And whose money was it that these financiers employed to relieve the embarrassment of stock gamblers and the institutions that had financed them, so that in a little time they will be launched on a new career of speculation and peculation? Not the money of the great financiers themselves, but of the large banks they controlled—that is to say, the moneys of depositors—your money and mine. For over two months legitimate banking was suspended that the crimes of illegitimate banking might be concealed and the perpetrators shielded from pursuit. Can any one doubt that immunity to these miscreants now means reproduction on even a larger scale of their practices and enormities when clearer financial skies shall once more create new opportunities for swindling by reviving the spirit of speculation? Can the recurrence of panic be avoided when the conditions of panic are perpetrated and even extended?

Sir, if the President be chargeable in any degree for this panic, it is not on account of anything he has done, but of things he has left undone. If he be open to criticism, it is not for having exposed rottenness in corporate management, but for having delayed the exposures. Had he turned the light on corporate management in 1901 instead of 1905 perpetration of many grave crimes would have been prevented, and the panic caused by them would have been sensibly reduced in violence, if not wholly averted.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that prosperity will ever be restored so long as the power of Government to punish crime remains doubtful. To-day men are walking the streets charged with the perpetration of enormous offenses, of which the proof is clear and convincing as Holy Writ itself, who have never denied their guilt, and yet not merely go unwhipped or even unchallenged of justice, but who still actually retain control of the very corporations they have pillaged and betrayed. Confidence can not coexist with such a state of affairs as that. [Applause.]

This spectacle of justice inert, paralyzed, helpless in the presence of stupendous crimes, is itself sufficient to plunge the country into distrust of all investments. For who can say that any corporation is sound while its officers may loot it with impunity? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The assertion that attempts of public officers to remedy these conditions and prevent their recurrence are incitements to disorder is a gospel of despair in this Republic. It means that government of the people and by the people can not be enforced against some of the people when they obtain control of vast financial institutions and abuse it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not belittle the difficulties obstructing the course of justice when enforcement of the law involves injury to many persons who are not perpetrators but innocent victims of criminal practices. Not merely is the loyalty of public officials in such cases tempted by suggestions that are base, but often motives in themselves commendable are invoked to check prosecution. During the recent panic the officers of banks who were being pursued before grand juries for crimes that had resulted in closing the doors were able to arrest the proceedings against them by undertaking more or less vociferously to reopen the concerns. While these movements were in progress there was a general disposition to suspend proceedings, lest prosecutions might interfere with the prospects of resumption. In some instances the efforts were successful. Depositors were persuaded to waive immediate payment of their dividends and the concerns resumed operations. At once the men who had wrecked them were lauded as saviors of society: I suppose because they had not blown up the buildings in addition to having pilfered the funds. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I agree with the President that it is difficult in such a state of public opinion to secure convictions of corporate officers for abuses of their trusts; but, sir, I do not believe that difficulty in overtaking malefactors furnishes any justification for abandoning pursuit of them.

For my part I think the most pressing necessity of a society afflicted by disregard of law among its powerful members is a determination by the chief officers of state to enforce the law. I do not think the President has yet exhausted all the powers of his great office in the direction of vigorously enforcing the law, but I do say that the message shows he appreciates his duty to the people in this respect. [Applause.] And appreciation of duty by a public officer is the first step toward the performance of it. For this reason the President's message is an inspiring proclamation that the gage of battle thrown down to the people by forces of corruption which, at the beginning of the session, it seemed might be left untouched on the ground has finally been taken up by the man who has always had the power and who now shows he has the disposition to do effective battle for justice and law, whatever the consequence. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, it is a stupendous issue—this between the President and the mighty forces of corruption whose gage of battle he has accepted. The elements arrayed against him are the most formidable that ever did battle in a struggle for privilege. The powers they can invoke are stronger in many respects than the powers exercised by government itself. I wonder if Members of this body realize the extent of the forces these embattled interests can put in motion.

In a lecture delivered in my own State a few weeks ago, I undertook to say that our political system had undergone a silent but radical revolution during the last few years, that the greatest powers in the community were no longer exercised in legislative bodies, in the council chambers of cabinets, or in the offices of a chief executive, but in the rooms where a few men direct the administration of great corporations or plan new corporate enterprises. True, there has been no change in the outward structure of our institutions, but the most profound revolutions have been those that affect not the form but the substance of government. All the forms of republican government survived in Rome long after the Republic itself had been replaced by absolute despotism. The atrocities of Caligula and Nero and Domitian, perpetrated under the authority of a republic, show that forms the most venerable may be perverted to perpetration of oppressions the most atrocious. And so, sir, the outward structure of our Government remains wholly unchanged. Not merely does our Constitution survive in form, but all our constitutional formulas are still acknowledged universally and invoked extensively.

Constitutionally each man has the right to go where he pleases, to work when he pleases for whom he pleases and for what he pleases, but between him and the exercise of these privileges lie formidable powers which the Constitution never contemplated and which government does not control. Practically no man can take one step from his own door to engage in the ordinary competitions of life except on conditions and terms fixed by some corporation operating a transit system, controlled by a few persons—generally by one—with whose selection government has nothing to do, whose orders and regulations, though binding on a whole community, government hardly pretends to regulate. What avails it a citizen that legally, constitutionally, theoretically he can sell his labor for what he pleases when the value of the wages he may earn is fixed absolutely by a few men in whose selection he has no voice, whose course he can not control or even influence? The cost of implements necessary to his calling, of the clothes that cover him, the food he eats, the fuel he burns, the materials used in constructing the house that shelters him, are all determined absolutely and even arbitrarily by some half a dozen men, who are also believed to control the chief highways of commerce throughout the country, and, therefore, the immense capital necessary to their operation. With the vast banking deposits which the control of production and transportation places at their disposal these same men dominate the financial institutions of every great city. And thus they govern not merely the volume of production and the means of transportation by which commodities are exchanged, but also, through control of the banks, they regulate credit, which is the very lifeblood of commerce.

Compared with these enormous powers exercised in secret by men clothed with no official authority, subject to no public supervision, acknowledging no responsibility, how trivial are the powers exercised by the nominal or constitutional government, whether State or Federal, or both combined. The National Government never comes in contact with me except when it delivers my letters or examines my baggage at the dock on my return from a foreign trip. These men affect closely every act of my life, every exercise of my muscular energy, every effort that I make for the improvement of my own condition, every plan that I contemplate for the employment of my resources or my abilities. While I refrain from crime I have no reason to be conscious that government, Federal or State, exists. But I can not take a step about my daily affairs without paying tribute to these forces, whose authority is undisputable, yet whom it is often impossible to locate, whose power is boundless, yet whose very identity is unknown. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Sir, the powers wielded by these forces must be controlled by law or they must themselves become actually the government. It has been said that these powers are necessary and inevitable products and features of a highly organized industrial system. The President's message does not discuss the extent of these powers nor the justification of them. It merely insists that whatever they be they must remain subordinate and subject to the law of the land. When we consider the influences they exercise, their power to reward the public man who serves them and to assail the one who obstructs their plans or assails their privilege, it would seem as if the outcome of a conflict between them and the constitutional government might be doubtful. Certain it is that the rewards in their power to bestow are preferred by many men of great talent to the highest honors of public life.

Twenty years ago a seat in the Senate was considered the supreme reward of political success, ample compensation for a lifetime of arduous labor, fitting crown for the most splendid career. Have we not recently seen the toga surrendered by one of the most distinguished Senators to become the adviser of financiers? And it is widely suspected that there are others ready, aye, eager, to follow his example if opportunity offer.

In New York—I speak here of that which is within my own knowledge—there was a time, and that not long ago, when a seat on the bench was the prize toward which every lawyer aspired, the success for which he labored, the fulfillment of his highest ambition. Within a few years we have seen one judge after another quitting that exalted station to accept the retainers of financiers, and it is quite generally believed that those who remain on the bench are straining their eyes for an opportunity to exchange the serene atmosphere of the courts for the profitable though less honorable service of corporations.

Sir, this is a spectacle which may well cause thoughtful men the gravest apprehension. The very life of the Republic is involved in maintaining the vigor and independence of the courts. We have restricted the powers of legislatures and no injury has followed to the body politic. We may reduce the scope of Executive authority, and no serious harm may ensue. But there must be in every system of government some depository of ultimate power, some department that can fix limits to the authority of all others. In a republic that power must always remain with the courts. It is a significant fact that whenever one of these judges exchanged the judicial ermine that is honorable for the livery of corporations that is profitable he invariably became a mouthpiece and exponent of the apprehensions entertained by his new employers—that the President is inclined to carry his love of justice too far.

Sir, not even when these doubts proceed from the mouths of ex-judges transformed into corporation attorneys can it be admitted that love of justice, however strong, in any public servant is incompatible with the welfare of the people.

Never, sir, will that be admitted by this House—at least by this side of the Chamber. Here we believe that justice is the true fountain of prosperity. [Applause.] So long as justice governs any enterprise it can have no fear of injury from enforcement of the law. Law can never be the foe of industry, but always its companion and handmaiden. Through law it enjoys peace, which is the essential condition of its efficiency. By law its fruits are defended and its prosperity promoted. It is crime which fattens on wrong, and its beneficiaries—the dishonest in commerce, the rotten in morals, the corrupt in politics—that can have any reason to fear the light of publicity or the sword of justice, and against these may that light never be obscured, may that sword never be sheathed. [Applause.]

Sir, if the rewards bestowed on their adherents, advocates, advisers, and apologists by these forces of intrenched privilege be so large that they are preferred to places of highest honor in the public service, so are the penalties formidable that they can inflict on their opponents, critics, or prosecutors. It would seem as if the man who incurs their resentment must be prepared to renounce hopes of the most profitable professional employment or of admission to the charmed circle of high finance with its opportunities for enormous profit. He must risk even his hopes of public approval. The storm which has raged round the ears of the President ever since he dared pick up the gauntlet thrown down by these great interests shows strikingly the extent to which they can affect public opinion by poisoning the sources of public information through their ownership of many leading newspapers. The public man whom they pursue will find his words misquoted, or suppressed, if distortion be impossible, his motives assailed, purposes attributed to him which are farthest from his own conception, a thousand difficulties created in his way when he returns to the constituents whom he tried to save from spoliation. The corrupt need no incitement to hostility against the honest. But hitherto many of the well disposed were cajoled into serving these interests by appeals cunningly directed to their fears and prejudices.

When we measure the enormous powers wielded by these interests, controlling, as they do, every avenue of success in the professions, in politics, and in commerce, we must realize, that hitherto opposition to their unlawful privileges by a public man demanded qualities little short of heroic. Here, sir, is the capital value of the President's message, which all good men must applaud, however they may have criticised or condemned former acts of the Administration. It states in unmistakable terms the exact nature of the contest before the country. Whoever reads it must see that the issue is between enforcing the law against all men and suspending the law in favor of a few men. On that issue, once stated, it will be impossible to divide the American people, and therefore the demand for justice embodied in this message neither party will undertake to ignore or deny in its platform—the Republican party because it will not dare and this party of ours because it will not want to evade it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It results, sir, that the campaign now opening will not be a contest between conflicting principles, but a choice of the champion who will do most effective battle for a cause which all will cherish, or at least profess to cherish. While no one will openly antagonize the President's policy of justice, the prospect of its being loyally maintained will turn entirely on the character of the man chosen to enforce it during the next four years.

Sir, it is no ordinary political contest, but a crusade to which the President invites us. The man to make this fight successfully must be animated by the spirit, the courage, and the unselfishness of a crusader. But, sir, the qualities of heroism are not common. The stuff of which crusaders are made is not to be found on every side. These qualities were described vividly more than eight hundred years ago, when Pope Urban II preached the first crusade to the great gathering at Clermont. You remember, sir, that while urging his hearers to take up arms for the delivery of the Holy Land from impious domination he told them they must not expect prizes of any earthly value, but they must renounce all hopes of gain or fortune. They must turn their backs upon the homes they loved; in frail barks they must cross seas wide and stormy; they must walk with bleeding feet over burning sands; they must face with dauntless breasts the scimiter of the Saracen; they must even, if need be, with naked hands climb the walls surrounding the city of the Holy Sepulcher profaned by the infidel's possession, and all these sacrifices must be made, all these fatigues undergone, all these perils incurred without any hope of reward or return, except the consciousness of a high duty loyally done. And as that vast assemblage, moved by his words, cried out with one mighty voice "It is God's will!" "It is God's will!" the Pope added, "Be those words your motto: Id Deus vult—It is God's will! Go forward in His name!"

Mr. Chairman, that spirit of readiness to face all difficulties for the sake of justice because it is God's will is the spirit which must animate the man fit to lead this campaign. Whoever undertakes the burden of this contest hoping for personal reward will very probably be disappointed. With all the avenues to success—professional, financial, and political—guarded patrolled, policed by sentries of the enemy, he must be ready to suffer, if need be, pecuniary embarrassment, misrepresentations of his motives and conduct, seduction of his allies, betrayal by men he trusts, defeat of his policies by treason even if he be successful at the polls. But, sir, though he be forced to taste all the bitterness of hopeless conflict, his sacrifice will not be in vain, his defeat will not be final. Sooner or later his cause will triumph. Though both parties be complaisant, though legislatures be corrupt, though courts be subservient, though judges may prefer to win the favor of powerful interests rather than do justice upon wealthy criminals, none the less the cause of the people will prevail, because it embodies that justice against which no organization of men has ever yet been able to make a successful stand. [Applause.]

But, sir, where is this champion to be found who, animated by the spirit of a crusader, will cheerfully face disappointment or disaster rather than compromise a principle, resting his hope of success not upon political finesse, but on devotion to an ideal? There is no crusader on the Republican side except one [applause on the Democratic side], and he is disqualified from the fray. His acceptance of a nomination by either party, or by both parties, would not be elevation, but abasement, almost dishonor. He has renounced the field of politics, and through that renunciation he has been lifted to a nobler plane by the spontaneous judgment of civilization. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Never before in the history of this country has a President, while still in office, succeeded in embodying so completely and voicing so emphatically the conscience of the people that a message of his will be embodied in the platforms of both political parties. And this domination of the whole political field has been accomplished in the face of a rancor fiercer than ever was evoked by any of his predecessors, not while he enjoys even a prospect that his official term may be prolonged, but after he has openly and finally renounced every chance of remaining in office. That sir, it surely is no exaggeration to say, is a position no President has ever before achieved, at least not till long after he had passed from the scenes of contentious politics and the grasses had been growing for many seasons above his breast. [Applause.] The position reached by this man no party success could improve, but any partisan affiliation must lower. For him to become the nominee of a party, whatever the outcome, would be to put on a duller armor, to enlist in a baser cause, to fight behind a meaner banner. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No friend would tempt him to such a descent; no patriot would deem him capable of contemplating it. [Applause.]

Sir, with the President eliminated, I repeat there is no crusader available among Republicans. I hardly think anybody would even suspect our distinguished Speaker of possessing the qualities of a crusader. Nor can I conceive the well-balanced Senator from Pennsylvania passing for a reincarnation or even for a lineal descendant of Godfrey de Bouillion, while the distinguished gentleman who is generally supposed to represent more directly the Administration is essentially a judge, and the judge's place is behind the crusader, following after him to organize, regulate, make permanent the results won in strenuous battle. But there is a man available on the Democratic side with every essential quality of the crusader, a champion of justice and morality, about whom there is only one doubt, and that is whether he be not too strenuous. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Men may question his judgment, but no one can doubt his loyalty. We may differ from his views on many subjects, but all men respect his virtues. I have opposed him in the past. Under certain conditions I might oppose him in the future. But I believe this message has outlined conditions under which he becomes for this campaign the foreordained champion of law, justice, and order. [Prolonged applause and cheers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, there are some features of the extensive political creed he has professed which I reject. If they were issues now, or if they become issues, and he the candidate representing them, I would be just as vehement in opposing him as I hope to be active in supporting him. But there are some questions on which I believe he embodies the conscience of the whole people, and if in the next campaign these be made the issues, I believe he will be invincible, because no one can question the sincerity with which he reaches his conclusions or the loyalty with which he maintains them. If he confine imself to demanding prosecution of all malefactors without distinction, except that if rigorous enforcement of the law should result in congestion of the criminal courts, then that plunderers of millions be given precedence on the pathway to prison over pilferers of pennies. [Prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield me five minutes further.

Several MEMBERS. Make it ten.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, if in addition to that he demand that United States Senators be elected directly by the people of the different States, so that the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol would become as quickly responsive to public opinion as this body has always proved itself, if he insist on publicity of all campaign expenses, so that while everyone who wishes may continue to subscribe freely, the people shall be informed of the sources from which all political subscriptions come, before the ballots are cast—if in addition to all these he demand also that special privileges against which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has declaimed, be abolished in fact—that wherever a tariff enables a trust to exploit the people, it shall be abolished altogether or, at least, reduced to the point where foreign competition may give consumers deliverance from exactions palpably unjust, he will then stand upon a platform in support of which his party is absolutely unanimous, and the people of this country practically unanimous. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not a man on the other side would venture openly to assail these principles. Our opponents might continue to talk about our former divisions, but they would be surprised at the genuineness of the present reunion. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Such a platform would embody nothing except a demand that equal and exact justice be done to all men, that society shall pursue its greatest enemies even more rigorously than lesser offenders against its laws, and that all citizens be placed on a plane of absolutely equal opportunity in matters industrial as well as political, and these are the demands embodied in the President's message. You gentlemen will be forced to nominate some man who will profess belief in its doctrines; we will nominate a man who will not need to make a profession of faith, for all the people will know that his heart and soul and every fiber of his being are instinct with ardor for them. All parties will therefore at least profess opposition to the abhorrent forces which the President has denounced. And this insures their overthrow. Conceive, Mr. Chairman, this most valuable fruit which the message has already borne. Elements which but yesterday thought themselves strong enough to dominate both political parties, whose newspapers were openly encouraging opposition to the one man whose nomination they feared on this side, and at the same time seeking to intimidate the champion of justice who has risen most unexpectedly from your ranks, are already completely defeated, demoralized, routed by the popular response to the President's appeal. The harsh notes of their organs still disturb the air, but as political forces they are already beneath contempt. Instead of governing and dominating both parties, when the two conventions shall have adjourned there will not be an inch of political ground left for them to occupy. Instead of being feared and cultivated and served, they will become political outcasts whom no one will regard, political lepers with whom association would be dangerous and contact fatal. Sir, here is success sufficiently brilliant to make an Administration memorable; triumph sufficiently decisive to insure a glorious place in history for any President. [Applause.]

Viewing it, Mr. Chairman, as I do, fixing as it does the issue of this campaign, and therefore indicating as it does the man best fitted to bear triumphantly this banner of justice, morality, and law, insuring as it does the triumph of principles for which the Democratic party has contended ever since the foundation of this Government, I have no hesitation in recording my judgment that the message read here last Friday is among the most valuable contributions ever made to the safety, the progress, the prosperity of this Republic. I care not what else the President may have done, I care not what other features of his record may be open to criticism, I care not what inconsistencies may at other times have marked his public life, I say of him now in the presence of this House and of the American people what I said to him last Saturday, when for the first time since this Congress assembled I stood in the White House. "As your first message of the session was read I doubted you. But your last message shows clearly that the courage which I had questioned remains unshaken, while the occasion for displaying it has been chosen with better judgment. Two months ago you might have been considered a candidate bidding for popularity. Now not even a breath of suspicion can becloud the spotless armor of unselfish patriotism in which you stand forth the champion of right."

Mr. Chairman, if anybody shared my views of the first message, I hope he will join me now in acknowledging the merit of this last communication, and as its author disappears from the field of contentious politics surely we may all hail him as a shining ornament of popular government, a loyal exponent of truth, an intrepid champion of justice—a great hero in the glorious galaxy of American heroism. [Prolonged applause and cheers.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the debate this afternoon, so far as it has been conducted by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, is certainly very instructive as to the versatility of the Democratic party. One gentleman denounced in bitter, unmeasured terms, unseemly, it seemed to me, in this Chamber, the President of the United States, our President, the President of this whole country, and I say that advisedly, for no man who has ever sat in the Presidential chair so fully fills the hearts of the American people as the man who sent to us the message so criticised. [Applause on the Republican side.] One gentleman, the gentleman from Ohio, whose years of experience in parliamentary procedure, parliamentary propriety, has covered more than a generation, it seemed to me, went far beyond the proprieties of debate in denouncing the Chief Executive and the message that he had sent to us, while another gentleman, who followed him, told us that this message was of such a character that he could scarce tell who should have originated it, whether it was Theodore Roosevelt or the object of his political adoration, William J. Bryan. The gentleman from New York, who has just taken his seat, has told us it meets his hearty approval, and he has devoted an hour's time to showing how, in all of the recommendations of the President, he has been right. Does not that show the versatility of Democracy? And, mind you, the sentences of the gentleman from Ohio were applauded when he was denouncing the Executive as vigorously as were the sentences of the other gentleman [applause on the Republican side] when they were extolling him.

Mr. Chairman, I was profoundly moved by the early sentences of the gentleman from Ohio, who so pathetically spoke of bygone days when he sat here in this House on a former occasion—years ago with men who were giants in their day, but who have mingled with the dust almost half a century. It was pathetic, pathetic indeed. But later I thought, as he rambled along among his captious and querulous comments, that if he had seen fit he might have indulged in personal recollections of a House that had assembled in times much farther remote. Mr. Chairman, this message of the President has received in some sections of this country very violent condemnation. But from whom? That is always a pertinent inquiry when you hear either denunciation or praise. In order to value either you must know the sources from which it comes. The denunciation in this case that we read in the newspapers comes from the organs of the very men, and those only, whom the President of the United States has seen fit to denounce as the great malefactors of the age. There is where the condemnation comes from, and that is the only source from which it has come to my knowledge except from the gentleman from Ohio. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, why do they denounce the President of the United States? They say because he disturbs business and because he produces a panic. Disturb business? What has the President done to disturb business? He is not engaged in business himself; he is not a rival of those gentlemen; he is neither a bull nor a bear. What has he done? He has simply called attention to the misdeeds of certain men and the manner in which they have perpetrated crime and the manner in which they have imposed valueless securities upon the public; the manner in which they have seized upon great railway corporations and bankrupted them; the manner in which they have added to the capital stock of railways such enormous sums as to jeopardize the possibility of there being any value in those that were or those that they have falsely issued. That is all. That is all that he has done. He has simply exposed, simply brought to the light, simply turned the lime light upon the transaction. Not of his action, but of others. Is it singular that there will be doubt and mistrust on the part of investors in the stocks and bonds of railway companies in the United States? I ask that question in all sobriety and candor. The value of a railroad stock depends upon the proportions between its volume and the possible or probable income of the road, and when three or four men can take hold of one of the most valuable of all western railways and in a single night add $92,000,000 to its indebtedness, is it to be wondered that men should be reluctant to invest their money in the stock of such a road? When a single man can add $182,000,000 to the bonds and stock of another railway, is it strange that men should hesitate to put their money into the stocks and bonds of that railway? Those transactions and similar transactions are what created distrust, created suspicion, and with other offenses brought about that want of confidence that has resulted in financial disaster in some localities.

But that is not all. The stock gamblers are all arrayed against the substance and essence of this message. Stock gamblers, in my humble judgment, did more than any other class of men, through their influence with the banks of the cities, to bring about this financial disturbance. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in the first half of the year 1904 the transactions on the Stock Exchange of New York, according to a report which I have, which is official, I think, amounted to about four and one-half millions of shares. This is the so-called legitimate business, as I understand it, not the bucket-shop business, not the floor trading of the brokers among themselves when they have nothing else to do. In a corresponding period of the next year those transactions advanced to about 12,000,000 shares, and in 1906 to upwards of 20,000,000 shares in the half year. Suppose it to be 40,000,000 shares during 1906—and this is the respectable part of this gambling—suppose it to be 40,000,000 shares; suppose that they represent simply face value, it means under their methods of business, the methods of the New York Stock Exchange, that the banks of that city must have furnished these traders approximately three billions and six hundred millions of money to carry on these transactions. If that is true, if this great proportion of the banking capital of New York was thus absorbed in illegitimate business, is it any wonder that later on when legitimate transactions were to be conducted, and men in ordinary business sought the banks for usual accommodations, that the banks were unable to supply their customers and that ordinary legitimate business languished? And yet these stock dealers are the men that are assailing the President of the United States because of his recommendation that stock gambling should cease.

Mr. Chairman, in the things that the President has done the American people to-day stand behind him. [Applause on the Republican side.] In every recommendation of his message the American people stand by him, ready to uphold his hands, ready to demand that the legislation that he asks shall be given in order that those recommendations may be made effective through the courts. [Applause on the Republican side.] There may be gentlemen who say there will be nothing done by this Congress. I do not believe it. I assert that the American people are earnest in the purpose of so clothing the Executive with power that he may be able to accomplish the reforms that are advocated in this message, and if men stand in the way, Mr. Chairman, they will be run over and may be disfigured badly in the contact. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear these encomiums of this message. I am glad to hear them, because as I read history they import a great departure—a great departure—from the policies and purposes of the Democratic party. There is legislation asked for here, legislation that men are doubting about the power of Congress to grant. I am glad to hear these gentlemen say that they approve of the legislation and saying that they will join hands with us in trying to secure it. A gentleman a little while ago said—the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]—among other things in his admirable speech, that everything that had been accomplished by this Government in the way of progress had come as a largess from the Democratic party.

I confess that I thought that was a statement somewhat startling. I thought there were many persons here who scarcely believed that the gentleman could be sincere. And he gave as an illustration of the progressive movements of the Democratic party the fact that the Louisiana purchase came from Jefferson's Administration. Ah! but Jefferson denied the power of the Federal Government to do the thing that he had done. Jefferson said that there was no power in the Government of the United States to purchase the Louisiana tract, and twice or three times came to the Congress of the United States asking for an amendment to the Constitution whereby his act of usurpation (as he regarded it) would be validated. Thomas Jefferson denied the power of the Government of the United States to assume the debts of the State. He said that there was no power; and although he did become a party to it, he said afterwards, in apology, that he was tricked into doing it by Mr. Hamilton. Mr. Jefferson always insisted that the Government of the United States had no power of any kind whereby it recognized as money anything but gold and silver. Oh, it is true the Democrats have progressed. I can remember only a few years ago they were urgent and insistent that they could pay off with honor and integrity a bond, interest bearing, with a greenback which was another promise to pay and did not bear interest. They are a progressive party, it is true. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, coming all down the history of the United States, the reader is surprised to find that every step in progress that it has ever made has been over the protest of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Republican side.] It has always insisted that there was no power in the Federal Government to accomplish these great results. But the limit of audacity was reached by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] when he suggested to an audience—very many of them more than 60 years old—the fact that it was to the Democratic party we owed the doctrine that the Federal Government had the powers to coerce a seceding State. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The only way in which I could account for that was that at the date when Mr. Buchanan and his then

Cabinet announced a different doctrine the gentleman had not then concluded to grace our citizenship with his presence and his person. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, seriously speaking, was it any act or through the influence of the Democratic party that this Union was restored, or was it of another party? Was it the Democratic party that demanded, after the victories of Gettysburg and of Vicksburg, when the Army of the Potomac was surrounding the beleaguered capital of the Confederacy, when the Confederacy was tottering to its fall, that declared in a national convention that after four years of failure to restore the Union by the processes of war, we must now quit the nearly won fight and go into negotiations, negotiations that had been tried and found a failure four years earlier? I did not know that there was a living man, not even the gentleman from Kentucky, who would have the audacity to make the statement that was made by the gentleman from New York with regard to that bit of our history.

If the Democratic party had had the power, to-day we would have unlimited quantities of greenbacks or else we would have been in complete bankruptcy. If they had the power, we would have had unlimited coinage of silver, without the intervention of an international agreement, at the ratio of 16 to 1 of gold. If they had been in power, there would have been no gold-standard enactment, and we would not be on a par with the other nations. If they had been in power, there would have been no Dingley tariff, with the prosperity of the last decade. I do not doubt but that that portion of the gentleman's address struck as very ridiculous some of his listeners who are now so anxious to recant all that they have ever said in extolling the greenback and sounding pæans on free silver. I do not believe that there is a Democrat within the sound of my voice who to-day would dare to say that he favored any financial platform of theirs enacted between 1860 and 1904. Not one. Every one of them is a repudiationist on that subject, although I believe that none of them believe in the repudiation of Mississippi some fifty-eight years ago.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] had much to say about the extreme poverty, the extreme distress, from which the people of the United States are to-day suffering. I assert that that is a matter of imagination with him; that there is no such suffering as he depicted in any part of the United States; that there has been no marked injury to the country banks whatever. On the contrary, outside of three or four cities, the business of the country is sound and the people solvent. There never was a time where there was more money in the banks than now, or when there was a greater freedom from apprehension of panic, except in the city of New York, and there they have to account for their own sins when they look over the situation.

Some gentlemen have complained that the President of the United States does not get a larger number of men into the penitentiary. I know a good many concerning whom I would give God-speed to him if his efforts were to be redoubled and his capacities in that direction multiplied a score of times. [Laughter.] But we must remember, Mr. Chairman, that there are difficulties in the way. How difficult it is to convict any man of crime, I do not care who he is, if he reenforces his defense with an abundant exchequer. It is almost impossible. You must remember, gentlemen, how many fictions we have thrown around the criminal, how many technicalities we have environed him with. What a large, unlimited play there is for him to move upon the sympathies of jurors. How difficult it is to keep an improper man from the jury list and then from the jury box. Look at the trials that we have had that have attracted the attention of the people of the United States during the last six months or twelve months; how many there are that the great mass of the people regard as mistrials and miscarriages of justice, where the miscreant has been unwhipped of justice because of our methods and because of the opportunities that are given to a man charged with crime to escape. All of these technicalities come down to us as a portion of the common law that first had their origin rightful in that time when there were sixty to seventy capital offenses, when under the law in Engalnd the criminal was not permitted counsel, when they were not permitted challenges of the jury, where in a great majority of instances they were ignorant men oppressed and abashed by the presence they were in, intimidated and fearful because of the presence of the court and the dignitaries they were before, condemned by ignorance, by fear, by self-recognized inferiority to silence—then it was right and proper to presume the innocence of a prisoner. But I submit to you that the legal presumption of the common law obtaining in our courts to-day that after a man has gone through with the preliminaries of arrest, after his case has been heard by a dispassionate grand jury, after he has been solemnly charged, under all these circumstances, the presumption that he is innocent, with all the presumption involves, does not promote the administration of justice. Such presumption is one of the anomalies of the common law for which no necessity now exists. Courts set aside verdicts because of mere technicalities. I believe that it would be wise policy if we were to declare that in the Federal courts that presumption of common law that I have referred to should not be regarded, but that all criminal statutes should be liberally construed in order to avoid evasion and to secure a due and proper administration of justice.

If that were so, then there would not be so many infractions of our law. If that were so, it would be possible to compel obedience to statutes of the United States that now every man who has a hundred thousand dollars to spare laughs to scorn.

Gentlemen say that Theodore Roosevelt produced this panic. Every sensible man knows that as long as human nature continues as it is, and as long as we do business as we do, panics will be inevitable. All of the great business of the United States is done with 5 per cent of actual money, 95 per cent with some form of credit capital, capital that has value only because it may have confidence, personal or public, behind it. Remove that confidence in any way and that 95 per cent of capital withers as though but paper thrust into a furnace. There will be panics in every country having a business system such as ours, where you can not have the actual money to do all the business. You have got to use this large proportion of credit that is based upon confidence or faith, and that shrivels into nothing whenever that confidence or faith is disturbed. Men will expand their business. I gave you an illustration of it just now in business, so called, where the stock gambling increased in three years' time from four and a half million in one period of six months in 1904 to twenty million shares in another six months later. All the money that these gamblers could get hold of they invested in their so-called business. The more money there was that they could reach, the more expansive became their business. For, mind you, their business is carried on without regard to the quantity or amount of a thing which is produced. In a single day more shares of Union Pacific stock have been sold in the Stock Exchange of New York than were ever issued.

On the board of trade in Chicago in a single year I am told by a gentleman who I think knows that 90,000,000,000 bushels of grain were bought and sold, eighteen times the entire production of the United States in its most prolific year. The subject of that kind of business is unlimited, except as it is limited by the banks. As long as the banks will loan, these gentlemen will borrow; and the banks prefer to loan to them, for they are the men who pay the extraordinary rates of interest. Whenever you see that rates are 1, 2, 3 per cent a day, as they sometimes are, you may know that the stock gamblers are busy. They are then conducting their business with alacrity. It is not the men engaged in the ordinary pursuits of commerce that can pay such rates of interest as that. Six, or at most, 8 per cent a year is the limit that their financial possibilities will reach. It is the stock gambler who is the favored customer, and these large rates of interest make them the most attractive of borrowers, and the banks favor them to the exclusion of legitimate business. Then when the real business must be done come the strenuous times.

Mr. Chairman, again I want to express my gratification at the manner in which this message of the President has been received, at the manner in which it has been generally and generously extolled by gentlemen of that side; and I want further to say that there are but few members on that side who will have the temerity to say anything else than honeyed phrases in speaking of it. They know that it meets the requirements, the demands, the expectations, the hopes of the American people, evinced by their efforts to appropriate all of its provisions. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, as an appendix to these remarks I desire to print the following article:

[From the Morning World, January 7, 1908.]

WALL STREET—WORST OF GAMBLING PLACES.

Governor Hughes in his message recommends the abolition of race-track gambling. He asks the legislature to make bookmaking at race tracks a prison offense, like pool selling. His authority for this recommendation is section 9 of article 1 of the constitution of the State of New York, which requires that "the legislature shall pass appropriate laws to prevent" any form of gambling within this State.

This section of the constitution should be enforced everywhere with equal justice.

Nowhere is its enforcement more needed than in the New York Stock Exchange, the Consolidated Stock Exchange, the Cotton Exchange, and on the Broad street curb. Race-track gambling at its worst is an evil of petty consequences in comparison with Wall street gambling. Race-track gambling injures only those who bet on horses. Wall street gambling may menace the legitimate business of the entire nation.

What other public service could Governor Hughes render comparable with the elimination, segregation, or even restriction of this great evil?

BANKS AS GAMBLING TOOLS.

In no other country than the United States are incorporated banks part of the machinery of stock gambling. In no other country are the methods of stock gamblers such as to require the constant use for that sole purpose of hundreds of millions of dollars of other people's money. In no other country is the National Treasury called upon to turn over the public revennes for the use of members of a stock exchange. In London, Paris, Berlin, Frankfort, and Amsterdam gamblers in stock must use their own money and their own credit as if they were playing at Monte Carlo instead of on a stock exchange.

This difference in stock gambling accounts for the great fluctuations in the rates of interest in New York as compared with the stability of European financial centers. In New York call money may be 3 per cent one day and 50 per cent the next day, something unknown in Europe.

The banking laws and the banking system of the United States concentrate the fluid capital of the country in Wall street. By bidding up the rate of interest higher than legitimate business can pay, stock gamblers are able to draw from productive industry its means for supplying pay rolls, for carrying on manufacturing, for distributing goods and for moving the crops.

To-day, for instance, the World's Wall street article bears the head "Flood of Cash Buoys Stock List." The money came from every part of the country—from many places where the business need of it is sore.

In Great Britain an increase of 1 per cent in the discount rate of the Bank of England is regarded as a serious fluctuation. For the Bank of France to alter its rate one-half of 1 per cent is a matter of international finance. For the Bank of Germany to charge a third of last week's highest rate in Wall street is done only after serious consultation with the Government, with great capitalists, and with business interests.

THE WORLD'S BIGGEST GAMBLING HOUSE.

Nowhere on the earth does another such gambling institution exist as finds shelter in the New York Stock Exchange—an unincorporated, irresponsible institution. According to the statistics carefully compiled by James Creelman, in Pearson's Magazine, there were sold in 1906 on the Stock Exchange 286,418,601 shares of stock of the par value of $25,000,000,000, besides 665,000 thousand-dollar bonds; on the Consolidated Exchange, 136,000,760 shares of stock, besides 21,569,178 shares of mining stock and 193,884,000 bushels of wheat. This does not include curb sales.

These gambling transactions amount to over $30,000,000,000—four times the value of the products of all the farms of the United States, half the value of all the land and buildings, one-third the census valuation of all the wealth of ever kind in the country.

Last year there were sold on the stock exchange 43,399,710 shares of Reading, fifteen times the total amount of Reading stock in existence. Of the Union Pacific, Harriman's road, there were sold 36,751,600 shares, twenty times as much as existed.

Ninety-nine and one-half per cent of these transactions, according to Thomas W. Lawson, are nothing except bets that the price goes up or down. They are as much gambling as betting on a horse race or on the card that comes out of the faro box or on the odd-or-even fall of the dice.

THE BUCKET-SHOP LAW.

Under section 343 of the penal code it is a crime for—

"any building * * * to be used for * * * making any wagers or bets made to depend upon the future price of stocks, bonds, securities, commodities, or property of any description whatever."

This law was passed to enable the stock exchange to close bucket shops and thus monopolize gambling in stocks. For this purpose the law is effective, because the bucket shop makes no pretense to actual delivery of the stocks in which it gambles, while the stock exchange does. The system of the stock exchange to evade the gambling law and to utilize for its own purposes the fluid capital of the United States is complicated. Were it simple and known to everybody it would long since have been abolished.

THREE BILLIONS OF MONEY.

Without banking facilities and credit, productive industry would be limited to the use of real money as the method of exchange. Business would become largely barter, because 95 per cent of the business of the country is done with checks. All the gold and silver of the world would not suffice to sustain a cash basis. The total amount of money in the United States, including gold, silver, legal-tender greenbacks, and national-bank notes, is only $3,000,000,000, while the exchanges of the New York Clearing House alone amounted in 1906 to $103,754,100,091, or thirty times the amount of all the money in the United States.

Of this money the United States Treasury holds a little over a third to cover its gold and silver certificates, as a reserve against its legal-tender notes, for the redemption account of national-bank notes and as a cash balance. Another third is held by the banks and trust companies as a reserve on their deposits. That leaves less than $1,000,000,000 for circulation.

THIRTEEN BILLION DEPOSITS.

The deposits of banks and trust companies other than private and national banks amount to $8,000,000,000. The deposits of the 6,625 national banks of the United States, as reported on December 3, amount in round figures to $5,000,000,000. All the money in the United States would not pay one-quarter of these deposits on demand.

THE RESERVE SYSTEM.

To protect the depositors and to prevent the undue inflation of credit, the national banking law, of which the State banking law is substantially a copy, provides that banks "must retain a reserve of lawful money." Three cities—New York, Chicago, and St. Louis—are made central reserve cities, where banks must keep on hand in cash 25 per cent of their deposits. Banks in twenty-eight other reserve cities must also keep 25 per cent reserve, but only one-half of this need be in cash in their vaults, the other half being allowed to be deposited in New York, Chicago, or St. Louis banks. In all other cities and towns the banks must maintain a reserve of 15 per cent, of which they need keep on hand only two-fifths, being allowed to deposit the other three-fifths in reserve banks.

This system drains the reserve money of the United States to Wall street. A commercial bank, charging merchants and manufacturers 6 per cent interest, can not afford to pay interest on deposits in competition with the Wall street banks, which can frequently get 20 to 50 per cent on the Stock Exchange for the use of their deposits. Thus these reserve moneys gravitate to the banks which can afford to pay high interest on them. This process of drawing the surplus savings of the country to Wall street was facilitated by the three great insurance companies—the Equitable, Mutual, and New York Life—which collected annually $200,000,000 from their policyholders. This money they invested in Wall street securities or deposited in Wall street banks, making their disbursements by New York drafts and keeping the cash here.

Wall street thus became a great funnel into which the savings of the people, instead of being available to the local manufacturer or the local storekeeper, were driven by higher rates of interest to the Stock Exchange.

The system of reserves directly invited this. If a national bank in Altoona or Columbus or Topeka deposited its money in a Wall street bank it not only received interest, but it was allowed to credit what the New York bank owed it to its legal reserve like real cash. But the debt of any country bank to a New York bank could not be credited to its legal reserve. A New York credit was legally cash and a country credit was not.

DEPOSITS AND LOANS.

When the recent panic became acute in November the clearing-house banks reported deposits of over $1,000,000,000. Of these deposits one-half were due to other banks. Of the loans, which slightly exceeded the deposits, over half were on stock exchange collateral. That is, the money collected from millions of depositors throughout the country by their local banks was used as the basis of Wall street credit and was the real money in the stock exchange game.

There are two general classes of loans. One is commercial paper—that is, discounts on bills of lading, on cotton, wheat, warehouse receipts, goods in manufacture, and the notes which retailers give their wholesalers and wholesalers give to their manufacturers. The other kind of loan is what Europe calls a finance bill and Wall street calls a collateral loan. It is a loan not on separable property, but on a piece of paper which represents an interest in indivisible property.

A share of railroad stock differs from a warehouse receipt for eggs, butter, cotton, or wheat in that no holder of it can demand so many rails and ties or locomotives and cars. No holder of United States Steel stock can demand so many tons of steel rails or iron pigs; no holder of Standard Oil stock can demand so many barrels of kerosene. Neither can the holder of any corporate bond demand anything except payment of principal and interest when due, and bonds run for such long periods that their payment is an asset too slow to be realized on in an emergency.

This distinction is recognized in every other country. The Bank of France last November declined to make any advances on American finance bills, while expressing its willingness to loan all the money that their value would warrant on cotton, wheat, corn, and other tangible goods in shipment. The Bank of England months ago not only refused to discount American finance bills itself, but notified its customers that they must not do so. The Bank of Germany was forced several years ago to adopt the same policy.

In these countries the discounting of finance bills is left to private bankers, who use their own private resources, without involving general banking facilities, which are restricted to the use of commerce, manufacture, and other business.

COMMERCIAL OR FINANCE.

Instead of the New York national banks following this wise policy of the great European banks by looking after their commercial customers, rather than seeking for the higher rates of interest which stock gamblers pay, they have adopted the contrary policy. In ten years, from 1896 to 1906, the New York bank loans on stock exchange collateral increased from $162,361,654 to $442,210,765. The gain in commercial loans was only two-fifths as much, $151,795,029 to $259,340,272.

During the panic weeks bank loans on collateral were actually increased. Banks had the alternative of carrying their stock-gambling customers or of such a stock exchange crash as would imperil their own solvency. Therefore some of the banks stopped commercial discounts and cut down the credit of solvent merchants in order to use all their resources to protect their brokers' collateral. It will be recalled that interest rates ran up to 200 per cent one afternoon, and that only the $25,000,000 cash which Mr. Morgan secured from the United States Treasury and dumped at once into the stock exchange prevented the immediate failure of gamblers who had bet that stocks would go up.

In the first three weeks of the panic the New York clearing-house banks increased their total loans over $100,000,000, yet at the same time they actually reduced their commercial loans.

THE MACHINERY OF GAMBLING.

The system of stock gambling in Wall street is different from that in any European country. Here every day the broker goes through the farce of legitimate purchase and sale. After one broker has bought and another sold, each makes a memorandum, and the transaction is sent out through the ticker everywhere. Then each broker tabulates his transactions and sends to the stock exchange clearing house a copy, with a check for the difference between his price and the closing price. The clearing house sends out notices to the brokers, telling them who is to deliver what shares of stock and to whom.

The next morning every broker who is to receive stocks sends to his bank and gets certified checks for the sums he is to pay. Part of the money he had already arranged for through the system of time and call loans on stock exchange collateral. For the rest his bank allows him to overdraw his balance, commonly overcertifying therefor. Then before 2.15 p. m. every broker who is to deliver stocks sends around the certificates and receives these certified checks. After 2.15 p. m., and before the banks close, every broker in turn deposits the certified checks and the stocks which he has received in his bank to make good the overdraft the bank certified for him in the morning.

HOW IT IS DONE ABROAD.

Without the banks' assistance this whole system would be destroyed and the stock gamblers in New York would have to gamble as do the stock gamblers in London, Paris, and Frankfort, where this form of actual delivery in speculative transactions is not gone through with. Instead, there are fortnightly settlements, where the losers pay and the winners collect their winnings. Such a thing as a London stockbroker having the Bank of England or a Paris broker the Bank of France certify his check in advance and thus furnish the funds for him to gamble with is unheard of. The European stockbrokers gamble as do the London race-track bookmakers, who have their regular settlement day at Tattersalls.

On the London Stock Exchange settlements are made twice a month. On the Paris Bourse settlements are made once or twice a month. On the Frankfort Bourse there are semimonthly settlements. On the Berlin Bourse there are settlements at times fixed by the Government regulation. If the parties desire to continue the gamble, a charge is made for an extension, but either party can quit the game and cash in at any time, just as in any other gambling house.

On the Continent these matters are regulated by the Government so that general industry will no more be interfered with by stock gambling than by gambling at cards or dice. The Prussian Government forbids the short selling of industrial stocks on the Berlin Bourse. Transactions on margins are forbidden, except in certain cases between registered parties. Unless a man registers his name as a stock gambler he can refuse to pay his losses. Transactions in futures on agricultural products are prohibited. In Paris, bourse agents are not allowed to operate on their own account. There is a tax on every order to buy or sell and on every completed transaction. The French system is analogous to the taxing, licensing, and regulation of ordinary gambling houses by the French Government.

The forms which the New York Stock Exchange go through to evade the New York gambling law are in vogue nowhere else.

GOVERNMENT REGULATION.

The French and German Governments treat stock gambling somewhat as race-track gambling is now treated in New York State, where it is permitted in race-track inclosures and forbidden elsewhere. But these continental governments go further. They even decide in what stocks and bonds they will allow gambling.

During the Japanese-Russian war the French Government instructed the Parisian brokers that no one might sell or offer for sale Russian bonds without giving their serial number. This prevented short selling. In Germany similar measures have been taken.

On both the Paris and London exchanges the brokers who do the buying and selling on the floor are distinct from the brokers who do business with the customers. The floor brokers do business only for other brokers, just as an English barrister—that is, the lawyer who tries the case in court—is not retained by the client, who deals with an office lawyer called the solicitor.

As a result of this separation of stock gambling from the banking business of the country the great drop in Russian bonds, hundreds of millions of dollars of which are owned in France, caused hardly a ripple on the surface of French trade and manufacture. The great fall in the market prices of South African gold and diamond mine stocks at the time of the Boer war did not shut off discounts and banking facilities to English manufacturers, forwarders, and merchants.

What other countries have done in segregating and restricting stock gambling the United States also must do, remembering always that Wall street also performs a legitimate function in providing capital for great enterprises and in affording a market for the actual sale of securities.

OVERCERTIFICATION.

The overcertification of checks is already a crime under the national banking law. Section 176 specifically prohibits the certification of any check "unless the person or company drawing the check has on deposit at the time such check is certified the amount of money equal to the amount certified in such check."

This, of course, prohibits certifying a check before 2.15 p. m. on the strength of deposits after 2.15 p. m. Its violation, however, is difficult to prove, and its evasion is easy by a broker putting in dummy notes at the time of certification.

STOCK-TRANSFER TAX.

One way to diminish stock-gambling is to increase the tax upon it. Last year one-quarter of the revenue of this State was derived from the $2 tax on every transfer of 100 shares of stock. The enormous amount of these stock-gambling transactions is shown by the fact that, in spite of gross evasions of payment, over $6,000,000 was collected, equivalent to 3,000,000 sales of 100-share lots. The ordinary broker's commission is one-eighth of 1 per cent on the par value, or $12.50 on 100 $100 shares. A tax of one-sixth of the broker's fee has had no appreciable effect to diminish the amount of stock gambling. Through the clearing-house system the floor traders escape this tax on many of their gambles by clearing stock and not delivering it.

This tax could be greatly increased. A tax of one-half of 1 per cent on all gambling transactions in stocks, grain, and cotton would pay all the State taxes, all the taxes of New York City, and all the taxes of every county, city, and town in the State.

ABOLISH STOCK GAMBLING.

To segregate stock gambling as is done in Europe and to make both unprofitable and illegal the use of other people's money by Wall street gamblers without the consent of the real owner, three short, simple changes in the State and national banking laws would suffice.

First—Require every bank to keep its legal reserve in the form of legal-tender money in its own vaults, instead of as bank credits in Wall street. This would retain in the banks of the manufacturing and agricultural sections of the country the real money necessary for wages and for moving the crops.

Second—Prohibit the payment of interest on demand deposits. A demand deposit is the correlative to a call loan, which is a Wall street gambling device. Commercial banks can not afford to pay interest on demand deposits. The stock-exchange banks can and do. By prohibiting any bank from paying interest except on time deposits the Wall street banks will be made unable to divert accounts which properly belong to commercial banks.

Third—Divide all check-account banks into two classes—commercial and finance; that is, banks of discount and deposit, which make loans only for the facilitation of trade, commerce, and manufacture, and finance banks, which loan for speculative purposes on promotions, syndicate allotments, stock-exchange collateral and the like. Then restrict every bank so that it may not do both kinds of business, and compel trust companies to be trust companies and not banks. This distinction has been long recognized in England, France, and Germany.

This remedy is national. These amendments to the banking laws would cut off the main source of supply by which the Wall street gamblers are enabled to risk other people's money.

But it is imperative to consider whether this gambling can not be entirely stopped. Certainly the State of New York can greatly restrict it by its power of taxation, which is the power to prohibit. The stock-transfer tax should be greatly increased. Like the excise tax, the receipts should be divided between the city and the State.

A tax of one-half of 1 per cent on all the transactions appearing on the clearing house sheets of the respective exchanges would be a trifling imposition on legitimate purchases and sales, and yet would raise on the basis of last year's transactions an amount more than sufficient to pay all the expenses of the city of New York and of the State government and of rebuilding the Erie Canal.

Such a tax would be less than the real estate broker's ordinary fee, and the legitimate transfer of real estate is in no way interfered with thereby. It would be exactly the same per cent as the real estate mortgage tax, which has facilitated loaning upon real estate and added to the marketability of real estate mortgages.

How much more important is it that Governor Hughes should rid legitimate business of the dominating evil of Wall street gambling than that mere race-track betting be suppressed.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the urgent deficiency appropriation bill be taken up and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 14766) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for prior years, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments be considered in their order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the amendments by the Committee on Appropriations be first considered. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous objects, Treasury," on page 8, after line 2, to insert:

Charters, Constitutions, and Organic Law: The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to withhold payment of the sum of $10,000 appropriated by the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, for the purchase of the manuscript of a new edition of "Charters, Constitutions, and Organic Laws," pending the approval of the Joint Committee on the Library, which is hereby authorized to pass upon the question of the completeness and accuracy of the work and to determine whether the manuscript submitted is the identical, specific manuscript which Congress agreed to buy and for whose purchase it appropriated $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 19, to insert:

For paper for interest, transfer, redemption, pension, and other checks and drafts for the use of the Treasurer of the United States, assistant treasurers, pension agents, disbursing officers, and others, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "District of Columbia," on page 13, line 1, to increase from $107,000 to $142,000 the appropriation for furnishing and equipping complete in every detail by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the new municipal building, for repairing and renewing old furniture, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 4, under the heading, "Public schools, District of Columbia," to insert:

That the appropriation of $25,000 provided to meet the expenses due to the operation of the compulsory education law, fiscal year 1908, is hereby made available for the purchase of all necessary articles and supplies to be used in the course of instruction provided for atypical and ungraded classes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 16, to insert:

Columbia Hospital for Women: To reimburse Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum for expenditures for indigent patients sent to said hospital by the Board of Charities in excess of the appropriations by Congress, from July 1, 1903, to June 30, 1905, $2,475.80.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous Objects, War Department," on page 19, after line 8, to insert:

To pay JOHN H. BANKHEAD for his services as a member of the Inland Waterways Commission from March 14 to June 18, 1907, $1,875.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Indian Affairs," on page 27, after line 8, to insert:

For the suppression of the traffic of intoxicating liquors among the Indians, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the fiscal year 1908, $3,500.

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment reads: "For the suppression of the traffic of intoxicating liquors." I move to amend by striking out the word "of" and inserting the word "in;" so as to read: "For the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 2, to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior is directed to place on the books of the Treasury to the credit of the Lower Brulé Sioux Indians in South Dakota, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, to be immediately available, said sum to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the purchase of cattle, mares, and stallions, or for such other purposes as he may deem to be for the best interests of the Indians: Provided, That the same shall be reimbursed to the United States from the first proceeds received from the sale of the lands described in the act of April 21, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 125), belonging to said Lower Brulé Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, after line 3, to insert:

For expense of surveys, allotment of lands to Indians, salaries and expenses of the Commission heretofore appointed for the classification of the Flathead Indian Reservation lands, and other incidental expenses in connection with the appraisement, classification, and sale of the lands embraced in the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, the sum of $60,000, the same to be reimbursable from the sale of said lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "United States courts," on page 34, after line 3, to insert:

All expenses that may be incurred and otherwise chargeable to the United States and District of Columbia in the approaching trial of the case of the United States against Hyde, Dimond, Benson, and Schneider in the District of Columbia shall be chargeable wholly to the United States and be paid from the respective appropriations made for expenses of United States courts out of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 2 on page 35.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine to give us some information in regard to the item on page 34, that which is an amendment. It has already been passed, but in reading rapidly I did not have time at the moment to catch the significance of it. I presume it is all right, but at the same time I think the Senate should have some explanation of it.

Mr. HALE. In this case, Mr. President, the indictment was found in the District of Columbia, although nothing here had anything to do with the charge or offense, except that the Department of Justice decided that the conspiracy was perfected here and jurisdiction could be had only here. Therefore, the indictment was found in the District. It is not a District matter in any way, and the District government should not be burdened with the expense. That is the reason why it is provided that the trial shall be at the expense of the General Government.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 3, to insert:

To pay James D. Elliott for services performed as United States attorney for the district of South Dakota from July 11, 1906, to March 4, 1907, the sum of $2,599.99.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, with reference to that amendment, I understand that the beneficiary of this appropriation was appointed district attorney for the State of South Dakota and that his nomination was rejected by the Senate. I invite the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to section 1761 of the Revised Statutes, which provides:

SEC. 1761. No money shall be paid from the Treasury, as salary, to any person appointed during the recess of the Senate, to fill a vacancy in any existing office, if the vacancy existed while the Senate was in session and was by law required to be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, until such appointee has been confirmed by the Senate.

The facts, Mr. President, of this case are not within my personal knowledge, but I understand they bring the case within the prohibition of this statute. I therefore submit the matter to the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, so far as it appears in the amendment the vacancy did not occur during a session of the Senate. The services, payment for which is provided for in the amendment, were from July 11, 1906, to March 4, 1907. The Senate on the 11th of July, 1906, was not in session. It seems to me, therefore, that the amendment would not be subject to the objection made by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. GAMBLE. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator from South Dakota if the disbursing officers did not refuse to pay the money because of this statute?

Mr. GAMBLE. I will say, in answer to the Senator, that that is true. James D. Elliott was United States attorney for the district of South Dakota, and resigned the office, I think, on the 10th of April, 1906, when the Senate was in session. The position was at once filled under the statute by the presiding judge making an appointment. The office was occupied by that appointee until the 11th of July following, when Mr. Elliott was appointed during the recess of the Senate. He took possession of the office on the 11th of July and held it until the 4th of March, 1907, he not being confirmed by the Senate. I think the officers of the Department held that the vacancy occurred at the time of the resignation of Mr. Elliott and that the position was not filled by the appointment made by the presiding judge. The services were rendered and the office held by the United States attorney from the 11th of July up until March 4, 1907. There is no question in regard to the services having been rendered.

I trust the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] will not interpose the objection, because, as I at first suggested, so far as the amendment appears, it is not in contravention with the terms of section 1761 of the Revised Statutes. If the objection should be insisted upon and sustained, it would drive this man, of course, to seek another remedy.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask the Senator from South Dakota if this is not a claim against the Government?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GAMBLE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. If this is a claim against the Government, it is not a deficiency, and, therefore, does it not appear here rather by courtesy than anything else?

Mr. GAMBLE. I think, perhaps, it would be a deficiency; certainly it is a deficiency so far as Mr. Elliott is concerned.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a deficiency in Mr. Elliott's finances, undoubtedly, but it can not be a deficiency in the sense of the law, because such a claim is forbidden by law to be paid.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I do not understand that the objection by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] was based on that ground. I trust the Senator from Texas will withdraw his objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I suggest that this amendment increases the appropriation in violation of existing law; that it is therefore subject to the point of order, and also that such an appropriation as this has no place in a deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the amendment is subject to the point of order, and I ask that it be disagreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the point of order proposed by the Senator from Texas withdrawn?

Mr. CULBERSON. On the contrary, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks that the amendment be disagreed to.

Mr. HALE. That will dispose of it on this bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. It goes out of the bill—very well; that is all I care for.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of the clause in line 14, on page 43, as follows:

THE ISTHMIAN CANAL.

For salaries of members, officers, and employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission, including assistant purchasing and shipping agents, and all other employees in the United States, $18,600.

For pay of officers and employees on the Isthmus other than skilled and unskilled labor, including civil engineers, superintendents, instrument men, transitmen, levelmen, rodmen, draftsmen, timekeepers, mechanical and electrical engineers, supervisors, clerks, accountants, stenographers, storekeepers, messengers, office boys, foremen and subforemen, watchmen, wagon masters, stewards, hospital dispensers, internes, nurses, and attendants, including those necessarily and temporarily detailed for duty away from the Isthmus, for the departments of construction and engineering, auditing, disbursing, and labor, quarters and subsistence, $210,700.

For skilled and unskilled labor on the Isthmus, including engineers, conductors, firemen, brakemen, electricians, teamsters, cranesmen, machinists, blacksmiths, and other artisans, and their helpers, janitors, sailors, cooks, waiters, and dairymen, for the departments of construction and engineering, accounting, disbursements, and labor, quarters and subsistence, $5,536,300.

For purchase and delivery of material, supplies, and equipment, including cost of inspecting material and of paying traveling expenses incident thereto, whether on the Isthmus or elsewhere, and such other expenses not in the United States as the Commission deems necessary to best promote the construction of the Isthmian Canal, for the departments of construction and engineering, auditing, disbursing, and labor, quarters and subsistence, $6,085,700.

For miscellaneous expenditures, cable and telegraph service, stationery and printing, and traveling and incidental expenses on the Isthmus, for the departments of construction and engineering, accounting, disbursing, and labor, quarters and subsistence, $157,700.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in reference to this Isthmian Canal appropriation, I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that in 1905 the assurance was given that no part of the appropriation for the Isthmian Canal should be used for the maintenance of a publicity bureau. Since then they have gone to a greater extent than previously and have established a newspaper on the Zone. I ask the Senator from Maine if any part of the money which is appropriated in this bill affects that question?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the matter of publishing a newspaper as the organ of the Isthmian Canal Commission, as the Senator from Texas will remember, had its rise in conditions here. It was found that a bureau had been set up, not simply to record the doings, the transactions of the Commission, but to furnish information to the press generally and to edit communications furnished to the press. The Committee on Appropriations and the Senate were very strongly against it. When the matter was laid before the President, he saw at once the impropriety of it, and the bureau went out of existence, as it was fitting it should.

Now, upon the Isthmus there is issued each week, not a newspaper in the sense of having editorials or editorial matter sent out, but a record of the work, a record of the prices, a record of the markets, simply a statement, so far as I have examined—and I have examined several copies—a statement which is convenient and handy for everybody down there, showing the existing conditions of the work. I had something to do with abolishing the old bureau, and was every earnest about it, as the Senator from Texas will remember; but I do not see in this sheet—it is not much more than that—anything that was objectionable in the old bureau. Therefore I have not thought it worth while to put any prohibition of it in this bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I was not asking the Senator from Maine, Mr. President, to put in the bill any prohibition; but I was asking him if this particular bill contained any deficiency so far as that publication is concerned?

Mr. HALE. The deficiency is of the fund generally, and undoubtedly this sheet—it does not cost much—is paid for out of the general fund, and the deficiency of $11,000,000 or $12,000,000 here includes that small amount, not in terms, but the authorities down there have authorized this paper, and the amount appropriated here, which is $12,178,900, includes that, undoubtedly.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if I recollect correctly as to the bureau which existed in this city and which fell under the condemnation of the last Congress, the objectionable feature was that there was an editorial department, not for the purpose of giving information as to the progress of the work, although that may have been a part of the design, but the main feature of it, as it was understood, was that it really occupied the position of an advocate for the purpose of defending certain policies or advocating certain policies. That was deemed to be an improper feature. I will ask the Senator from Maine if I am correct in that?

Mr. HALE. The Senator has stated it exactly.

Mr. BACON. As I understand now, the publication of which he has been speaking and which at present is being issued upon the Canal Zone has not that objectionable feature?

Mr. HALE. Nothing of the kind at all; in fact, the old bureau that we were all against did not issue any paper or sheet, but furnished information and edited matter for outside papers.

Mr. BACON. For publication in other newspapers?

Mr. HALE. And to influence public sentiment.

Mr. BACON. In other words, it was a propaganda?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, it seems improper for me to let the occasion pass without saying that the identical person who had charge of the publication bureau connected with the old Isthmian Canal Commission is now the editor of the paper to which I have called attention. He has simply been shifted from the United States to the Canal Zone and his duties enlarged by providing him a means, at the expense of the Government, for presenting his views with reference to the conditions on the Zone and the progress of the work there. Not only are tables printed giving prices and the progress of the work, but in the one or two issues of that paper that I have noticed, Mr. President, there are editorial comments. The question, therefore, is whether the Senate will consent to one of the Departments of the Government—that is, the War Department on the Canal Zone, or the Isthmian Canal Commission—publishing a newspaper at the expense of the Government of the United States. There is, in my judgment, Mr. President, no difference in principle between the case as presented now and the case as it presented itself during the last Congress, except that the present instance is more aggravated than the previous one.

I desire to offer at the end of this paragraph an amendment to the effect that no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay for the expense of publishing a newspaper on the Canal Zone.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas will not be adopted. The newspaper, so called, that is published on the Canal Zone is not the same proposition at all as was presented to the Senate when the matter of Mr. Bishop's employment was considered in a previous Congress. The newspaper published on the Canal Zone now is simply to disseminate knowledge throughout the nation as to what is actually taking place in the work on the Zone. It is a mere statement of facts, not only to supply information throughout the United States, but also to inform the various employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission as to what is taking place in the different parts of the Zone. The matter has been thoroughly discussed before the Canal Committee. Colonel Goethals testified before the committee that the publication of this sheet resulted in great good to the workmen throughout the Zone in encouraging them to perform their duties, as in this journal credit is given for good work to the employees under each department.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as the Senator from California is familiar with this matter, I should like to ask him a question. I ask him for information, not arguendo. Does the Senator know what salary Mr. Bishop gets now as editor of that paper?

Mr. FLINT. I understand he receives no salary for editing this paper; that it is a mere incident to his other employment. He attends to his other work, and supervising the publication of this paper is merely an incident. He is not engaged in the same line of work as that which was heretofore criticised by the Senate.

Mr. BACON. What is his other work?

Mr. FLINT. The other work is acting as secretary to the Commission on the Zone. I do not know just exactly what his work is in detail as secretary to the Commission, but it was testified before the committee that his connection with this paper is a mere incident to his other work.

Mr. BACON. The Senator, then, has no information as to what his work is?

Mr. FLINT. He is secretary to the Commission.

Mr. BACON. The point of the inquiry is this: When Mr. Bishop was engaged in the business in Washington he had some other title, but he was at the time, just as he is now in the Zone, nominally, at least, engaged in other work. It developed, however, and was, I think, brought to the attention of the Senate, that while thus nominally engaged in other work at a salary of $10,000 per annum, he was in fact engaged in what I suggested just now might be properly denominated as a propaganda. He issued no sheet here, no newspaper; but it was understood that he was engaged in the preparation of matter which was published in other newspapers. Congress stopped that, and yet the same party is now employed under some other title and engaged, in a degree at least, in the same class of work. It seems to me, after Congress has indicated its intention that this employment should cease, that when it is brought to our attention that he has been shifted to another position of a similar kind at the same salary—a salary, I will remark by way of parenthesis, which was very severely criticised in this Chamber as being excessive—employed in a similar capacity and engaged in a degree in the same kind of work, and when the statement is made that he gets nothing for that work, but that it is an incident to his other employment, it does seem to me that it is not unreasonable to ask that we should have definite information as to what that other employment is.

Furthermore, I should like to know, if the Senator has information upon the subject, whether the same gentleman, Mr. Bishop, is limiting his literary labors to this little newspaper, or, if the Senator is prepared to tell us, either affirmatively or negatively, whether he is still engaged in the same propaganda in which he was engaged when the matter was before the Senate during the last Congress.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I understand from the statement of the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT] that Mr. Bishop is the secretary of the Isthmian Canal Commission. In his official capacity as secretary he receives from day to day practically the body of the information which is printed in this so-called "paper." The information manifestly comes to him without express or particular effort on his part. It is official information, which he as secretary is required to collect in order to keep thorough track of the work in progress. Originally editorials were prepared and policies with reference to the Zone were advocated by the distribution of such editorials and comments through the press of the United States.

This work of giving forth information concerning the progress of the work and the manner of its performance is clearly not in the nature of a propaganda; it is not in the nature of an effort to influence policy, national or otherwise, but is the furnishing in convenient form to the American people of a class of information which they would seek by correspondence if it were not perfectly convenient for them to get it through some other channel.

I imagine the work of the secretary of the Commission would be very greatly increased and the expense of his office considerably increased if, instead of issuing this paper at stated periods, with all the information it contains, he relied upon answering particular letters and inquiries concerning the progress of the work. His staff of clerks would undoubtedly have to be increased, or else the secretary would have to decline to furnish any information at all concerning the work in progress on the Zone. The people of the country are very greatly interested in this canal work. Many persons have apprehended that it would involve an expenditure of money entirely beyond the most extravagant estimates ever presented to Congress or the country.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CARTER. In a moment, if the Senator will permit me. Other men, Mr. President, have apprehended that the work might prove a failure altogether. The execution of this great project involves the aspirations and dreams of the country throughout centuries. The country is deeply, actively, and profoundly interested in the success of the enterprise, and consequently interested in all the information that the secretary of the Commission can give forth with reference to its progress from day to day.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana now yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CARTER. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. I noticed in the press some little while back that Colonel Goethals, the engineer in chief—an army officer, of course, and a very accomplished one—in his testimony before some committee of the House, when asked as to the probable cost of this canal, was unwilling even to limit it to $500,000,000—that is my recollection—and when some one there endeavored to get some fixed sum which would be sufficient, there was no definite information furnished. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana whether the purpose of this newspaper is to let the American public into the confidence of the Commission by degrees and ease us down, or ease us up to the $500,000,000 schedule?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the construction of the canal is the business of the people of the United States, being executed by the agencies of the Government. The people are as much interested in this information as the engineers in charge, and I think the diffusion of information is certainly not a reprehensible proceeding.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator takes his seat——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. In order that he may direct his reply, if he has the information, to the specific point—and as I understood the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], it was not in any manner directed against the propriety of such information being furnished to the people of the United States and also to those engaged in the work on the Zone, for that would be commendable and nobody would object to that—but the point suggested upon which I should like, if the Senator has the information, that he would give it to us, is this: The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who, I am sure, was entirely in accord with the judgment of the Senate in the last Congress as to the impropriety of the propaganda which was being prosecuted in this city, gave us the assurance that in the present publication there was no such feature. If it had rested there I am sure there would have been nothing further said, because everybody will recognize the propriety of the fullest information being given to the people of the United States in regard to the progress of this work, the money that is being expended, the difficulties that are being encountered, and the possible expenditures before there can be an accomplishment of the great design. I repeat, if that assurance of the Senator from Maine had rested as the final information nothing more would have been said. But the Senator from Texas replied to that, I think, either that he had seen or had information that this publication went beyond the matter of giving this information and that it contained editorials the design of which was either to defend certain policies or to advocate certain policies. In other words, it was again a propaganda in another shape. If the information of the Senator from Texas in that regard is erroneous, of course we would be glad to be informed of it; and if we can be satisfied it is erroneous, I am certain there will be no objection to the proper expenditure of money in the giving of needed information.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Georgia as to the purpose of this publication, I desire to call his attention to the statement made by former Senator Blackburn, who during his last service in the Senate was the recognized leader of the opposition in this body. Senator Blackburn before the Interoceanic Canals Committee, in speaking on this very subject, said:

> Whatever may be said about the literary bureau that was complained of in the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, I do not think there will be found in the Canal Record from its establishment until now any cause for criticism upon the score of "boosting" anybody connected with the work of building this canal. I think its main object, and the best feature connected with it, consists in the fact that it is an official statement merely of facts, given weekly to the American people and to the world, as to the progress of that work and its condition from week to week. I think its main value consists in the fact that, without any effort to magnify the work of the Commission or anybody connected with the Commission, it is an open, frank presentation to the American people and to the world of the progress that is being made and the exact status of that work in every detail from week to week.

Colonel Goethals in his statement says it was intended largely to give to the people working on the Isthmus information of orders that were issued from time to time by the Commission and to keep the employees advised as to the condition of the work on different portions of the canal itself, and that, in his judgment, it was a very wise provision, not only from an economical standpoint, but for the purpose of keeping all the employees on the canal fully advised of the work that was in progress at different points on the Isthmus.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not propose to debate the general conditions on the Isthmus. The money will be appropriated because it is needed for the great work there. Nor do I take much interest in the issuance of this sheet—this paper, so-called. I have examined three or four different issues, and I have discovered nothing in it that is anything more than a statement of existing facts from week to week. I have seen no editorial that attempted to argue any proposition in any way disputable. I do not think the sheet is doing any harm, and it may do some good. It will never be circulated much outside the Isthmus. Very few people will ever see it. The secretary, Mr. Bishop, is giving no time of any account to it. I presume the figures are compiled by some clerk and the paper is issued from week to week. While I was very much against the propaganda and against the Bishop performance here in Washington, I am satisfied all that has disappeared and that this sheet which is issued is not subject to the objections that arose at that time, and which I believed in then and believe in now.

I am desirous of getting the bill through as soon as possible. If the Senator insists upon his amendment let us have a vote upon it, and if the amendment is put on it will not do any harm. If it is not put on it will not do any harm.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] a moment ago quoted Colonel Goethals as to the cost of the canal, and I think he must have relied on newspapers and not on what Colonel Goethals said.

Mr. TILLMAN. I relied on newspapers.

Mr. LODGE. I read from the stenographic report of the hearing:

> The CHAIRMAN. I observe, Colonel, you are quoted this morning in the papers as saying that the aggregate cost of the lock canal would be $300,000,000.
> Colonel GOETHALS. I was misquoted. I stated that, making a rough estimate in April, we thought the canal would cost approximately $250,000,000, but I was not prepared to make any estimate, and will not be prepared until the annual report is made next year, at which time we hope to have estimates ready to submit, stating exactly what the canal will cost.
> The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you, Colonel, whether in that approximate estimate that you say you have made——
> Colonel GOETHALS. It can hardly be called an estimate. It is merely a guess.
> The CHAIRMAN. I want to ask you whether that includes all expenditures for construction as well as those expenditures that are necessarily incident to construction?
> Colonel GOETHALS. That was to include everything except the purchase money; to include sanitation, civil government, and everything—the canal completed. We had estimated roughly that it would not exceed $250,000,000; but I think that estimate can be materially reduced now.

His approximate, rough estimate is less than $250,000,000. He said nothing about $500,000,000. He said he was misquoted when he was represented as having said $300,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. If a sea-level canal should be constructed——

Colonel GOETHALS. I do not think there is money enough in the country to build a sea-level canal. [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It would be nothing but a ditch if we did built it.

Colonel GOETHALS. That is all, and I do not know. if you would ever get the ditch built. We have difficulties enough with a lock canal. I do not think we should attempt the sea-level.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you say as to the time required to make a sea-level canal?

Colonel GOETHALS. I would not even make a guess.

So his estimate of the lock canal now under construction is $250,000,000, and he thinks the detailed estimate will show it to be less.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator tell us what book he is reading from?

Mr. LODGE. I have been reading from the stenographic report of the hearing before the House committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am glad to get more consolation from that than I got from the newspapers.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the canal question is hardly a live one for us. Some time ago we determined that the canal should be built, and then we put the whole matter in charge of the President of the United States. Whether wisely or unwisely it was put there, and it is there now. Later the question came up whether we would have a sea-level canal or a lock canal. That was determined by Congress in favor of a lock canal. We do not know anything about the expenditures, except we know that we have to make the appropriations. Where the money goes, whether it is wisely distributed or not, we know nothing about, and we are not entitled to know. Congress voluntarily abandoned all supervision of the canal, directly or indirectly.

I want to say a word in reply to this gentleman who says there is not money enough in the country to build a sea-level canal. You can tell what a sea-level canal will cost with a great deal more precision than you can tell what a lock canal will cost. There is not an engineer in this country who is qualified to call himself an engineer in the profession, who can not sit down and tell what a sea-level canal will cost, and there is not one, and there never has been one, who can tell what a lock canal will cost. You have merely to cut a ditch for a sea-level canal. That is a disrespectful way of speaking of a canal. For this canal you have to build locks for which there are no precedents in the world. You have to build a dam under conditions such that no good engineer, in my judgment, will ever declare its construction to be feasible and practicable. I know it has been said, and said officially, by men connected with the canal, that if they had the power to determine for the same cost between a sea-level canal and a lock canal, they would take a lock canal; and the only thing they ought to have added, to make that statement complete, is that the more locks you have the better the canal would be. Any engineer who makes such a statement writes himself as disqualified to pass upon this great question.

A majority of the engineers of the world have on two occasions at least determined that a sea-level canal could be constructed; and it can be constructed, beyond a question. The President of the United States called together the engineers of this country and of Europe. A majority of them declared that a sea-level canal could be constructed. They made an estimate, not a very accurate one I will admit, but they made a general estimate of the cost. It was as accurate as any estimate that ever has been made of the cost of a lock canal. A majority of them decided in favor of a sea-level canal, but the President decided with the minority and concluded he wanted to build a lock canal. I do not want any discussion with a man who tells me that a canal which requires you to climb a mountain with your ship is better than one on the dead level from ocean to ocean, because he is either ignorant or unfair.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that the great majority of the American engineers were in favor of the lock canal, and the further investigation that has been made has simply confirmed the opinion of the American engineers on that subject. For a sea-level canal it is not simply necessary to dig a ditch, as suggested by the Senator from Colorado, but there is the Chagres River, a torrential stream, which the ingenuity of man up to date has been unable to control. Under the sea-level system——

Mr. TELLER. I did not surrender the floor to the Senator to make a speech. He can make his speech when I get through.

Mr. HOPKINS. I beg pardon.

Mr. TELLER. For more than twenty years this question has been before Congress. I have myself taken part in its discussion. I have studied every report made on the subject. I have given it as much attention as has the Senator from Illinois, and I say now that nothing has been demonstrated in an engineering way to justify any man in saying that a lock canal is better than a sea-level canal.

I should like to put myself on record here to-day, Mr. President, in order that some man some time may read it: In my judgment this canal will be an absolute failure if made with six locks, and will not meet the demands of commerce, which we ought to be under obligations to do if we take charge as we have taken charge of the canal. We have said that nobody else shall build the canal. We said to the French Government: "You may build the canal with the De Lesseps Company; but you shall not build it by France. If it is to be built by a company, we will not object; but no nation shall build it. We reserve the right to build it ourselves." When we took that position before the world we were in honor bound to build a canal that would meet the wants of commerce and would meet the judgment of the engineering talent of the world. It may be that a majority of the American engineers who were consulted declared that a sea-level canal was not so good as a lock canal, but every shipmaster who went before the committee without, I believe, a single exception declared that a sea-level canal alone would meet the demands of commerce.

Mr. President, up to the time when Congress determined to build the canal I had voted always every time I had an opportunity against the canal. I voted against it when three men voted against it, when four men voted against it, and when seven men voted against it. I said then the American people want to build the canal, they are able to build it, and as far as I am concerned I mean to vote every time for appropriations to build it. I mean to vote for such appropriations as will make it a success and not a failure.

There have been no such dams in the world as it is proposed to build on this canal. There have been no locks of the kind proposed to be built on the canal. There are no precedents for it. This was determined upon by the engineers that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] now falls back on. They determined the size of the locks and their general character; and now we are told that we must increase the size of the locks. The business of shipbuilding has demonstrated now that the locks are too narrow. I have no hesitation in saying that the last thought is better than the first; that the locks ought to be increased both in length and in width. But if there had been proper attention paid to it, and if the right man had had hold of it, there would not be here, five years after, a suggestion that you shall now change your plan and build a different canal than you then declared was ample to meet the requirements of the commerce of the world for all time to come.

This is a more risky canal than a sea-level canal would be. It may cost a little less, but when it is done it will not have cost much less than a sea-level canal would have cost. This engineer who was before the committee, who now has the canal in charge, thinks it may cost $250,000,000 over and above the purchase price, as I understand. That will make it cost $300,000,000. I do not believe there is an engineer in this country who has sat down and examined the question who believes it can be built for $300,000,000. But if it can be, it will be a second-class canal when it is completed. The world has had some experience in canals. Of course it has never had any experience with a canal like unto this. Somebody will tell you because up here on the Lakes we have a successful lock canal, you can have a lock canal climbing a mountain nearly a hundred feet high. The one lock up here on the Lakes is less than 20 feet in its lift. There is nothing in the one case as in the other. In Panama there are to be three locks, one above the other, and built in duplicate. Take a big ship, starting in the upper lock, and if it makes a slight movement it will go to the bottom of the canal and destroy the six locks. The risk is a hundred times greater in a lock canal than it is in a sea-level canal. With a pressure of 85 feet upon your bank, a little leak under the bank will leave you without a dam in a few hours.

I have not said this because I am opposed to making the appropriation; and in the short time I am to be here I expect we will appropriate at least $100,000,000 more. My successor will vote for more than $100,000,000 on top of that. If this canal is built within $500,000,000 and you have a successful lock canal, you will disappoint the best engineering talent not simply in this country, but throughout the world. I do not believe anybody can tell what a lock canal will cost. I do believe you can tell what a sea-level canal will cost. But you are meeting obstacles in connection with your locks that nobody has ever met with before, and nobody can tell what will happen. We do know if certain things should happen with your lock canal it is the end of the canal as an instrument of value to commerce for one or two years, or more.

I do not think it is of much consequence whether there is a newspaper published down there or not. If I believed it was a good paper I would be glad to subscribe for it myself, in order to keep in touch with the work as it goes on there; not that I want to criticise it, but I should like to know how rapidly we are approaching the completion of the canal. One man goes down there and spends two or three days looking it over and says the canal can be completed in five years, and another tells you in eight years. No living man can look at the canal and give any better judgment as to how long it will take than a man who has never seen it.

The great trouble we had with the Nicaragua route was that we never knew what a canal would cost, because we never had a unit to start with. We knew nothing about how large the locks would have to be. We knew nothing except the generalization of some engineers, who told us the canal could be built for $65,000,000. We started in on the Nicaragua route with a canal which, had it been completed fifteen years ago, would not be worth $100 to the commerce of the world to-day.

Mr. President, some of you will live to see this canal abandoned. Some of you will live to see a sea-level canal between the Pacific Ocean and the Atlantic. Then the great ambition of mankind will be accomplished. When the water shall flow from one ocean to another, and ships shall go unhindered by locks, then, and then alone, will the commerce of the world be satisfied with our efforts in this behalf.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of my friend, the Senator from Colorado, to the fact that the average rise and fall of the tide at Panama is 18 feet, and the spring tide is 21 feet. Therefore a sea-level canal must have double locks, certainly on the shores of the Pacific at the Bay of Panama.

Mr. TELLER. I wonder if the Senator from California thinks I do not know about the tides. I wonder if he thinks I have been here wrestling with this question for twenty-odd years and do not know what the tide is; whether I do not know how to prevent the high seas of the Pacific from ruining the canal. It is the simplest thing in the world, with one lock.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the question of the relative merits of a sea level and a lock canal. I will take advantage of the opportunity, however, to say that I quite agree with the Senator from Colorado, and at the time when the matter was before the Senate I favored a sea-level canal. But there was one thing said by the Senator from Colorado which I do not think ought to be permitted to pass without dissent. The Senator asserted, if I understood him correctly, that we have surrendered the right to have any further control over the question of what shall be done in the construction of the canal, and that our sole duty is limited to the appropriation of money for its construction. From that proposition I most radically dissent, and I think it important that it should not pass without a dissent, because there is now too much of that disposition on the part of some officials of this Government. There is nothing done in obedience to law or in prosecution of anything authorized by law that is not within the control of Congress. Congress can withdraw, if need be, any authority it has given. I am not speaking about this particular matter, because, of course, there is no prospect or possibility of that; there is no thought of it. But Congress, the law-making power, is the authority which keeps its hand and its control on every Department of the Government and on every work of the Government done in pursuance to law. In fact, it has power and control over everything except some things which are devolved upon the coordinate branches of the Government by the Constitution, as to which they are not in a sense accountable to Congress. But even there the final account is to Congress, and I am unwilling that the present disposition to assume an authority independent of and superior to the control of Congress should be encouraged by any word that I may utter or any assent that I may give to words uttered by another in that regard.

Of course, I do not suppose the Senator from Colorado really means the full import that could be gathered from his words, and that he simply meant to criticise the action of Congress in having surrendered, to the extent which it has done, the practical work of the construction of the canal. Certainly from nothing that has been done by Congress can there be legitimately deduced the conclusion that Congress has surrendered the right to itself control in every department and in every particular.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not mean to say, and I did not say, and no inference can be drawn of that kind, that Congress could not take charge of the canal. The Senator from Georgia knows that there has never been any effort to control it in the slightest degree except to make the appropriation of which I spoke. When we abandoned the management of the canal to the President of the United States we left it there, and it is there now, and the Senator knows just as well as he knows that he is a Senator from Georgia that no bill can be passed now to take it out of the hands of the President. So it is practically there, and it is a waste of time to criticise him with the management there. If there is any fault, it is with Congress for having abandoned its control over it, for the time being at least.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, just a moment more with reference to this matter.

Several statements have been made as to the character of this publication on the Zone, rather varying, coming from different Senators. I happen to have the issue of January 1, 1908, copied in the hearing before the Senate committee. I had myself made some statements about the character of this publication, calling it a newspaper with comments, not being confined to mere statements of the work done on the canal. That statement was in a sense disputed.

I shall ask that this copy of what is called the "Canal Record," published free, weekly, under the authority and supervision of the Isthmian Canal Commission, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so that the people of the country may know that they are supporting a real newspaper on the Zone.

Mr. President, I will not attempt to analyze the contents, but I call attention to the fact that there is an article in it from the Rev. M. Britton King, superintendent of the Wesleyan Methodist Mission, as to the work done among the negroes in that locality. Some people will be interested to know that he states there that "all the negro women were dressed in white gowns, petticoats, kerchiefs, and caps, and the men as neatly." There is also a chapter devoted to social life. There are also personal paragraphs stating what is going on socially. Among others it says:

Miss Edith Slifer—

I desire to have this go in the RECORD at this place, because it deserves to be there—

Miss Edith Slifer, daughter of the general manager of the Panama Railroad, who came to the Isthmus to spend Christmas at Colon with her parents, sailed for New York on December 26, on the Dunottar Castle, accompanied by her friends, Miss N. Stull and Miss Vera Bergman. The Misses Margaret and Mary Slifer, who have also been spending Christmas at Colon, returned to New York on the Finance, which sailed from Cristobal on December 31.

There is another statement, and I pick out these because they strike me more favorably than some of the others—

The Ancon club held its business meeting on New Year's morning at 8.30 in the sun parlor of Hotel Tivoli. The committee on the dance to be given by the club announced that the only available date for the Tivoli ballroom is February 29. The ball will be a flower dance, and the ladies will appear in costume, each representing a flower. Invitations will be extended to other clubs in the Zone. The committee will have the arrangements completed in a short time.

Attention is called to the Ancon Amusement Association, and the members of the committee are referred to.

Mr. President, there is another item here which will be interesting to all Southerners. It is headed "Circus on the Isthmus."

CIRCUS ON THE ISTHMUS.

Shipp's Great American Circus, which has come to the Isthmus by the way of New Orleans, opened at Colon on December 28, with its "old-fashioned circus" performance, remaining there three days. It opens in Panama on the evening of January 1, continuing for eight nights and a Sunday matinee. It will go next to Empire for two or three performances, and then go to Gorgona for one or two.

We have in the publication an article about the advance of Christianity on the Zone, and an advertisement that a circus will appear Sunday afternoon in a matinee! I only call attention to these few excerpts to show the character of the paper, which is somewhat different from that indicated by my distinguished friend from Maine.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Texas yield for a question?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator seems to have received this valuable publication. I have not been honored with a copy, but some Senator told me that it was being franked. I should like to know whether that is done according to law or whether it is an assumption of authority.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think it is being received by Senators who are members of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. I myself have received a number of copies. I do not recall whether it is franked or not, but I happened to have this copy of January 1, 1908, which was printed in the hearings before the Senate committee, and I want it entered in the RECORD as my answer to the suggestion on the other side of the Chamber as to the character of the publication.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted to print the paper in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NOTES OF PROGRESS.

ARRIVAL OF THE CULEBRA.

The seagoing suction dredge Culebra arrived at La Boca on the morning of December 28 after her long voyage of 12,000 miles. She is a sister dredge of the Ancon, which was described in the Canal Record of October 9. She sailed from Sparrows Point, Md., on the morning of October 9, with a crew of 53 men, in command of Captain Helliksen. Previous to her departure the hopper doors were sealed and covered with cement in order to make them water-tight, and the hoppers filled with coal as a reserve supply and as ballast. Heavy weather was encountered for the first few days out, and on the fourth day she ran into a hurricane lasting about eighteen hours, but she proved herself a good sea boat and no damage was sustained. Barbados was reached on October 19, where coal and provisions were obtained. She sailed from there October 20 and had fine weather to Pernambuco, Brazil, where she arrived October 30. After coal and stores had been obtained she sailed November 4 and had fine weather until within 200 miles of Montevideo, when a heavy southeast gale was encountered, lasting for about twelve hours. Montevideo was reached November 13, where four days were spent in coaling and securing provisions. She sailed on November 17 and had fine weather until Cape Verde was sighted, when she ran into a heavy southwest gale and anchored off the cape on November 23. During the gale the starboard anchor was lost. She left Cape Verde the next day and ran down to Possession Bay, Straits of Magellan. On November 25 she proceeded to Gregory Bay and anchored there for the night, and the next day, November 26, arrived at Punta Arenas. Coal and provisions were obtained and on November 30 she sailed, encountering very bad weather from the Straits of Magellan to Coronel, Chile, where she arrived December 7. Coal could not be obtained there on account of the heavy swells beating into the harbor and the voyage was continued to Valparaiso, where she arrived December 9. After coaling and provisioning she sailed on December 11, and had fine weather to Callao, Peru, which was reached on December 17. After again laying in a supply of coal and provisions she sailed for La Boca. The entire trip lasted eighty days, of which sixty-one were spent at sea and nineteen at the various ports en route. The average speed for the trip while at sea was about 9 knots per hour, and on her official trial trip in Chesapeake Bay she made a record of 9.88 knots per hour in a 90-mile trial run.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES.

Employees should understand that in order to receive payment on account of illness or injury under the regulations of the Commission, it is necessary to present themselves at a dispensary for treatment, or have a physician visit them in quarters in all cases where they are detained from their duties. Under the Chairman's circular, No. 144, which was published in the Canal Record of October 2, the physician's certificate must state specifically that the illness was contracted through no fault of the employee, and it is obvious that such certificate can not be given unless the physician has personal knowledge of the employee's condition.

This is published for the information of all employees, in view of the criticism to which physicians have been unjustly subjected for refusing to furnish certificates in cases where they were not consulted by the employees.

TWO MORE USABLE FRENCH BARGES.

The sanitary department has recently called the attention of the Chief Engineer to two 75-ton coal barges lying in the Rio Grande where they had been abandoned by the French company. They are about one-half mile below the point at which the Panama Railroad crosses the canal prism near Pedro Miguel and are similar to the one taken apart and conveyed by railroad to La Boca and rebuilt, as described in the Canal Record of November 13.

These barges are in fairly good condition and can be economically rebuilt. They are at present full of water caused by the rains of the recent wet season. The water will be pumped out and the decks housed over during the coming dry season, and at the next rainy season an effort will be made to float them to the shipways at La Boca, as they are too far away from the railroad to be taken there by train. It is thought it will not be a difficult matter to float them out during high water in the river.

Because of the special design of these old French barges they have the same advantages as ships built with a double bottom and are structurally very strong and practically unsinkable. The space between the bottom of the barge and the bottom of the hold, with the lateral bulkheads, forms air-tight compartments, so that if a hole were knocked in the hull by a collision, or even if the hull itself were cut in two the barge would float. This feature of construction has proved its usefulness on several occasions.

CULEBRA ISLAND QUARANTINE STATION.

A permanent Canal Zone quarantine station is being established on Culebra Island, in Panama Bay, for use at the Pacific entrance of the canal. It will be composed of ten buildings, which are now in course of erection, and which will be used as follows: Building No. 1 for the general detention of cabin passengers; No. 2 for the general detention of steerage passengers; No. 3 for women steerage passengers and attendants; No. 4 for station attendants' quarters; No. 5 for a plague laboratory; No. 6 for a laundry, and Nos. 7 and 8 as isolation wards for suspicious cases of infectious or contagious diseases. Building No. 9 will be the superintendent's residence.

A double system of water supply will be provided for the island. Salt water will be pumped directly from the sea to a 50,000-gallon tank located on the near-by island of Naos, from which a 6-inch water main will be laid under the narrow strait separating the islands and leading to all the buildings, furnishing ample sanitary and fire protection. The fresh-water supply will be obtained from the rainfall. Gutters on the eaves of the buildings will be connected with pipes, which will carry the water to two tanks, with a combined capacity of 100,000 gallons, located near the pump house (building No. 10). These tanks are so arranged that in case of necessity fresh water, brought in barges from La Boca, can be pumped into them. This fresh water supply will be used only for cooking and other necessary purposes, the main supply being salt water, as stated above.

On account of the rise and fall of the tide at this point, which amounts to about 20 feet, a wharf of such construction will be built as to render it available at all stages of the tide. It will consist of two bridge spans, each 55 feet long. One end of span No. 1 will be fastened to the shore abutment by a hinge joint. The other end will rest upon a float or pontoon held in position by guide piles, and will follow the vertical movement of the water until the tide is half out, when a cross beam on the pontoon will rest upon a support on the guide piles and will prevent further downward movement of the pontoon and of the inshore span. One end of span No. 2 is also secured to the same pontoon, the other end being on another pontoon, 20 by 50 feet in size and about 6 feet deep, which will form the wharf landing. This second pontoon will also be held in place by guide piles and will follow the total vertical movement of the tide. At extreme low water the wharf will have a grade of about 10 per cent from the landing to the shore, and as there will be 15 feet of water at the end of the wharf at extreme low tide, steamers connected with the quarantine service will always be able to make a landing.

The plan of this wharf is a modification of the landing used by ferries in the States. It is not known, however, whether a wharf of this character has ever before been attempted where there was such an extreme tide, but it is believed that this simple solution of the case will accomplish the desired purpose at a minimum cost. All the material for building the wharf is on the ground and all the steel and iron needed in its construction consists of old French material found on the Isthmus.

HIGHEST DAILY SHOVEL RECORDS.

The subjoined table gives the highest daily records of steam shovels in the Department of Excavation and Dredging from December 1 to 24, inclusive:

Shovel No.	Date.	Location.	Amount of material removed (cubic yards).	Kind of material.
221	Dec. 3	Bas Obispo	1,900	Rock and earth.
116	do	do	1,788	Do.
205	Dec. 21	Empire	2,140	Do.
126	Dec. 4	do	1,164	Do.
222	Dec. 18	Culebra	2,072	Do.
128	Dec. 2	do	1,960	Earth.
211	Dec. 13	Pedro Miguel	3,164	Soft rock.
110	Dec. 6	do	1,900	Earth.
103	Dec. 13	Mindi	1,334	Rock and earth.
115	Dec. 21	San Pablo	1,450	Do.
54	Dec. 20	Caimeto Mul	1,030	Earth.

Shovels in the one-hundred class are 70-ton shovels with buckets of a capacity of 2½ cubic yards. Shovels in the two-hundred class are 95-ton shovels with dippers of a capacity of 5 cubic yards. Shovels in the fifty class are 45-ton shovels with dipper capacity of 1¾ cubic yards. The shovels are under steam for eight hours per day, but are not actually worked during this entire period, time being lost by the necessity of moving the shovel forward, blasting stone too big for the shovel to handle, keeping the shovel supplied with cars, etc.

GATUN STEAM SHOVEL WORK.

The maximum daily output for the week ending December 21 was made on Friday, 20th instant. The amount excavated was 7,174 cubic yards, car measurement, being an average of 1,435 cubic yards per shovel.

For the same period there was loaded by steam shovels Nos. 113 and 114, at the spillway, 18,178 cubic yards, car measurement. The largest day's loading for both shovels was on the 21st, when 3,622 cubic yards were taken out. Steam shovel No. 114 made the largest output for any one day during the week, loading 2,016 cubic yards on the 21st.

DREDGING AT LA BOCA.

The maximum daily output by the three dredges of the La Boca dredging division for the week ending December 28, scow measurement, was as follows: December 27, dredge A 2, 6,772 cubic yards; December 28, dredge 14, 7,012 cubic yards; December 26, dipper dredge, 4,480 cubic yards. The total output of each of the three dredges for the same period was, dredge A 2, 29,205 cubic yards; dredge 14, 24,882 cubic yards; dipper dredge, 20,160 cubic yards. The total output from December 1 to December 28 was, dredge A 2, 143,024 cubic yards; dredge 14, 130,797 cubic yards; dipper dredge, 59,590 cubic yards.

TAMPERING WITH FIRE OR WATER SUPPLIES.

The special attention of employees and all other persons concerned is called to the following section of the "Rates, rules, and regulations governing the use of water on the Canal Zone," which were adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission on October 28, 1907:

"No person, or persons, shall remove, obstruct, injure, molest or otherwise tamper with any fire hydrant, standpipe, fire plug, tank, hand-grenade, fire extinguisher, hose, hose reel, cart, engine, harness, valve, box or cover, stop cock, stop box or cover, or any other tool, fixture, apparatus, pump, machinery, or building of any kind whatsoever connected with or necessary to the proper and efficient operation of the water systems, or for fire protection within the Canal Zone; nor shall any person, or persons, willfully or otherwise, misuse or waste, or cause to be misused or wasted, water supplied from the water mains owned and operated by the Isthmian Canal Commission and the government of the Canal Zone. Any person, or persons, violating any provision of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction, shall be punishable by a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $25, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to firemen in the regular discharge of their duties and duly authorized representatives of the Division of Municipal Engineering."

"CONTRACTOR" INSTRUCTED.

To the Editor of the New York Herald:

In reply to an article signed "Contractor," dated November 8, 1907, criticising the amount of earth and rock excavated during October, 1907, from the Isthmian Canal as ridiculously enormous, I would like to inform him that steam shovel No. 103, located at Mindi, Canal Zone, October 8 (the month he mentions), excavated 1,419 cubic yards of rock and earth, and on October 23 excavated 1,950 cubic yards of rock and earth. The bank this shovel was working in contained 17 feet of rock and 7 feet of earth.

Shovel No. 103 is of the 70-ton class with a dipper capacity of 2½ cubic yards. I personally saw this shovel perform the above work on both days, and I know that it was done in a working day of eight hours.

We cordially invite Mr. Contractor to come down on the Isthmus and spend a week with us and we will show him how to make the dirt fly and also convince him that we are earning all Uncle Sam pays us and have no place for drones here. The boys can grumble here, like Contractor does, but it is because they can not get more dirt out, and that would be almost an impossibility, but we will try to overcome impossibilities and keep up the old American record for activity during the dry season.

Contractor must also remember and take into consideration that this work was performed during the height of the rainy season. We would be thankful if Contractor would give us credit for what we do instead of trying to hold us up to ridicule. We are away from home, but still Americans, and the laugh is on him.

EMPLOYEE MINDI.

GATUN, C. Z., December 6, 1907.

The above reward will be paid by the Isthmian Canal Commission for the arrest or apprehension, or for information that will lead to the arrest or apprehension of Blas Martinez, who is wanted by the Canal Zone police authorities for the crimes of murder and rape, committed in Las Savannas, Canal Zone, on December 19, 1907. The description of Martinez is as follows:

Information relating to Martinez should be immediately communicated to the chief of police, Ancon, Canal Zone.

GEO. R. SHANTON,
Chief of Police.

Approved: D. D. GAILLARD,
Acting Chairman Isthmian Canal Commission.

ANCON, December 28, 1907.

TWO HUNDRED DOLLARS REWARD.

On December 23, 1906, Paul Chung, a Chinaman, was murdered at Paraiso, by being struck on the head with some blunt weapon. The perpetrator of the crime has never been discovered. Some of the circumstances surrounding the murder are similar to those connected with Philip F. Kramer, at Paraiso on December 16, 1907, for which $500 reward has been offered. Relatives of Paul Chung offered a reward of $200 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the murderer, which reward is in the hands of the chief of police and still remains good.

ESCAPED MURDERER CAPTURED.

Prisoner John Hughes, who on December 20 escaped from his guard while being taken from his cell to the mess hall at Ancon police station, was recaptured by the police in Las Sabanas on December 27. Hughes is a prisoner who is wanted on the charge of murder in the State of Florida. He is a large, powerful man, and was captured only after a long run and rough-and-tumble fight.

Hughes will be sent at once to New York in charge of a Zone police officer. Upon the arrival of the boat he will be turned over to the proper authorities, who will take him to Florida to stand trial for the murder of which he is accused.

WESLEYAN METHODIST MISSION.

WORK DONE AMONG THE NEGROES IN THE ZONE AND AT PANAMA AND COLON.

[By the Rev. M. Britton King, Superintendent.]

The Wesleyan Methodist Church on the Isthmus of Panama is a branch of that church in the West Indies and is included in the Jamaica district, which is under the direction of the missionary committee of the English conference.

This church, together with the Methodist Episcopal Church, owes much to the zeal and ability of the great missionary bishop, Dr. Thomas Coke. Doctor Coke was a gentleman commoner of Jesus College, Oxford, who was associated with the Rev. John Wesley in his evangelistic work and who in 1784 was appointed superintendent of the Methodist Church in America. On one of his voyages to the United States, accompanied by three ministers, they were driven so far out of their course by a gale that when land was sighted it proved to be the island of Antigua, one of the British West Indies, where they landed on Christmas Day, 1786. Here they found a warm welcome, for although there was no resident minister, Methodism had already taken root there. A wealthy planter of the island while on a visit to England several years previously had come under the influence of Wesley's preaching, as had also several of his slaves, and as a result of the missionary work done by them after their return home about 2,000 people had embraced the Methodist faith. It was early in the morning when Doctor Coke and party landed, and he met many of the people going to the 5 o'clock Christmas service. This custom is still maintained, and the early service Christmas morning is one of the best attended of the year throughout the West Indies. Doctor Coke was much impressed with the congregation and said in his letters that it was "one of the cleanest audiences I ever saw. All the negro women were dressed in white gowns, petticoats, kerchiefs, and caps, and the men as neatly."

When Doctor Coke left the island to resume his voyage to the United States an illustration was given of the generosity of the people toward their ministers. "Seed cakes, sweet biscuits, oranges, and bottles of jelly were brought in such abundance," said Doctor Coke, "that although I shared them freely with my fellow passengers, we had not disposed of half their store when the eighteen days' voyage ended." So impressed had Doctor Coke been with the conditions there that he left the three ministers who had accompanied him in the West Indies. One was stationed at Antigua, another at St. Vincent, and the third at St. Christopher. The work spread rapidly to the other island colonies of Great Britain and to those of France, Holland, and Denmark, and in course of time to the republics of Spanish Honduras, Haiti, Santo Domingo, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Panama.

Organized work on the Isthmus of Panama by the Wesleyan Methodist Church was started in 1882, the year of the earthquake, and the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the mission was recently held.

A line of mission stations was established, including Colon, Gatun, Lion Hill, Bohio, Frijoles, Empire, Pedro Miguel, and Panama. The mission at Colon was originally known as the Taylor mission, so named because it owed its inception to Bishop Taylor, whose missionary labors were attended with great success in many lands. Day schools were opened; but these, with the exception of those at Panama and Colon, have since been closed on account of the formation of the Canal Zone government schools. Sunday schools at the mission station are still continued and there are about 30 teachers and 550 scholars enrolled, with an average total attendance of about 400. There are at present two ministers of this church on the Isthmus, one residing at Panama and the other at Colon, who make frequent visits to the mission stations in the Zone, and a staff of sixteen lay preachers, all negroes, who hold services regularly at these places. There are young people's societies at Panama, Colon, and Empire that are doing much good At Cana, where the Darien Gold Mining Company's operations are located, a catechist cares for the religious and educational needs of the people. The buildings at Panama, Colon, Frijoles, Lion Hill, and Gatun are the property of the church; those at Pedro Miguel, Empire, and Bohio were loaned by the French company, which courtesy has been continued under the present Isthmian Canal Commission. A few months ago the schoolroom at Colon was destroyed by fire, and unfortunately the loss was not covered by insurance, but an effort is being made to rebuild it. In Panama the foundation of a new church was laid about nine years ago, but adverse circumstances caused a cessation of the work. Building operations have again been started, and a stone church 70 by 40 feet is in course of erection, the corner stone of which was laid on New Year's Day, 1908. A plan for a new church at Colon is also under consideration.

A large majority of the members of this church on the Isthmus are natives of Jamaica and other islands of the West Indies, and are employed by the Isthmian Canal Commission or the Panama Railroad Company. There are about 750 communicants on the church registers and about 3,000 adherents over whom the ministers have pastoral charge. Frequent visits are made to the various hospitals of the Commission, and there are numerous letters that come from anxious relatives and friends in regard to persons on the Isthmus that require much attention and time. Practically all the work in connection with these mission stations is financially self-supporting, as it has always been the policy of this church to inculcate among its members the duty and privilege of self-help in regard to supporting its various benevolent enterprises. In this way the interest in and concern for the progress of the work has been maintained.

A few years ago the then existing political conditions nearly brought about the suspension of the work. Services could only be held occasionally and at great personal risk, as several of the ministers were under fire at various times. Now, under the blessings of a more settled form of government, services are regularly held and the work is carried on with no interruption from political causes.

PERSONAL.

Owing to the recent change in plan for the locks and dams at the Pacific end of the canal, Mr. Sydney B. Williamson, division engineer, has moved his office from La Boca to Corozal, and all communications should be addressed to him there.

Mr. F. H. Newell, Director of the United States Reclamation Service, who has spent several days in visiting different parts of the work on the canal, returned to New York on the Dunottar Castle, which sailed from Cristobal on December 26.

Miss Edith Slifer, daughter of the general manager of the Panama Railroad, who came to the Isthmus to spend Christmas at Colon with her parents, sailed for New York on December 26 on the Dunottar Castle, accompanied by her friends, Miss N. Stull and Miss Vera Bergman. The Misses Margaret and Mary Slifer, who have also been spending Christmas at Colon, returned to New York on the Finance, which sailed from Cristobal on December 31.

Dr. and Mrs. T. C. Lyster, of Ancon Hospital, returned to the Isthmus on the Finance, which arrived at Cristobal on December 26.

Mr. M. J. Stickel, secretary of the Y. M. C. A., at Cristobal, sailed on the Dunottar Castle on December 26 for a six weeks' leave of absence in the States. During his absence Mr. F. C. Freeman, traveling secretary of the Y. M. C. A., will have charge of the clubhouse at Cristobal.

Mr. Paul Stanley Erricson, of the office force of the Hotel Tivoli, and Miss J. Irene Trau were married in Ancon on the afternoon of December 24. Mr. and Mrs. Erricson will reside at the Hotel Tivoli.

CIRCUS ON THE ISTHMUS.

Shipp's Great American Circus, which has come to the Isthmus by the way of New Orleans, opened at Colon on December 28, with its "old-fashioned circus" performance, remaining there three days. It opens in Panama on the evening of January 1, continuing for eight nights and a Sunday matinee. It will go next to Empire for two or three performances, and then go to Gorgona for one or two.

COMMISSION CLUBHOUSES.

The bowling match at Culebra on Christmas Day resulted in a victory for Lamster and Vogel, of Culebra, in the two-men team contests, they having a total pin fall for the three games rolled of 1,202. Winters and Roberts, also of Culebra, were second, with a pin fall of 1,131. The individual event was won by Durand, of Empire, with a score of 580 for the three games, with Vogel, of Culebra, second, with 588. Lamster, of Culebra, scored 243, thus winning the high-score prize. Contestants were entered from Cristobal, Empire, Gorgona, and Culebra.

A new class in Spanish will be started Wednesday, January 8, under the instruction of Mr. Bernard Beckerlegge. The last three terms have been very successful.

Both chess and pool tournaments are advancing rapidly and are bringing forth some admirable latent talent and many surprises.

Saturday, December 21, the Cristobal Y. M. C. A. basket ball team was defeated by the Y. M. C. A. team from Gorgona by a score of 33 to 29. The game was clean-cut and snappy from start to finish. A debating club, recently organized and known as the Senate, is creating a considerable interest among the Y. M. C. A. members. Judge Thomas H. Brown, jr., is acting president, and under his leadership the men expect to settle many weighty questions.

SOCIAL LIFE OF THE ZONE.

THE BEST CHRISTMAS CELEBRATIONS SINCE AMERICAN OCCUPATION.

Christmas, 1907, will be remembered on the Zone as the merriest Christmas since American occupation. Social and domestic life are so well developed and organized that the community Christmas entertainments were successfully carried out, and great satisfaction is felt by those who had them in charge. Especial attention was paid to the children, and the entertainments in which they took part were appropriate and interesting, while gifts were numerous. A generous Christmas spirit was manifested, everyone contributing in one way or another to their success. Nearly all the celebrations took place on Christmas eve, though some were deferred until later, thus making the holiday week one of pleasurable anticipation and excitement for the little ones.

At Christobal on Christmas eve, the Union church, the woman's club, the day school, and the Y. M. C. A. joined together in giving an old-fashioned Christmas party in the Commission clubhouse to the children of Cristobal. Santa Claus was there in all his glory and gave presents to the children from a genuine Christmas tree brought from the States. About 500 people were present, and after the exercises were completed popcorn, candy, nuts, and orangeade were served in the reading room, and music was furnished by the Canal Zone band. It was a Christmas eve long to be remembered.

The community of Gorgona celebrated Christmas enthusiastically, the united efforts of the Y. M. C. A., the Sunday school, and the woman's club having been put forth to make it memorable. The entertainment was given in the Commission clubhouse. The committee in charge was L. F. De Montrency, Henry E. Daly, and John J. Easton, of the Y. M. C. A., assisted by a committee of the woman's club and teachers in the public schools. The program committee of members of the woman's club, consisting of Mrs. Jack Fogerty, Mrs. C. Pierson, Mrs. R. C. Goodale, Miss Laura Faxon, and Mrs. Ralph Wolf, had charge of the drilling of the children. The decorating committee, Mrs. Jack Eason, Mrs. Bergstrom, and Mrs. Johnson, had charge of the tree and the decorations of the room. The tree was beautifully trimmed with the usual Christmas decorations and, in addition, a number of small colored electric lights. The children gave the entire program of 29 numbers, lasting an hour and thirty minutes, which wound up with a tableau, composed of six children watching for Santa Claus before an open fireplace, through which came Santa Claus (Mr. Frank Morrison) with a jingle of bells. After a short speech the presents were distributed. Each child received a toy, a tarlton stocking filled with apples, oranges, nuts, and raisins, and a house box filled with candy. There were about four hundred people present. The Christmas tree was afterwards turned over by the committee to the people of the colored church. On Christmas night the committee finished distributing presents by giving out two barrels of apples and a half barrel of oranges from the steps of the Commission clubhouse to the native children of the town. The work of the woman's club had much to do with the success of the entertainment. The purchasing committee in the States was composed of Miss Helen Varick Boswell, of the National Civic Federation, and Mr. John M. Glover, international secretary of the Y. M. C. A.

The Christmas entertainment at Empire, given by the Y. M. C. A. at the Commission clubhouse on the evening of December 24, was a decided success from every point of view. There was an excellent program rendered by the Ernest Gamble Concert Party and the school children. The portion rendered by the children consisted of the following: March and drill, led by the master of ceremonies, Master Bun Davies; vocal selection, Miss Eva Harris; address of welcome, Miss Lucy Stuntz; piano solo, Master Cleland McDevit; recitation, Miss Elizabeth Pickens; choral selection. The most exciting part of the program was the arrival of Santa Claus and his distribution of the hundred Christmas stockings to the children present. Many other presents were also distributed.

On Christmas eve, at Culebra, the Sunday school, assisted by the woman's club and Y. M. C. A., gave a very enjoyable entertainment for all the children of Culebra. A tree sent from the States, and appropriately decorated, was the center of attraction, and added materially to the enjoyment of the evening. A program of songs, recitations, and drills by the children was presented, together with a visit from Santa Claus and the distribution of gifts.

The tree and entertainment at Pedro Miguel was held on Christmas eve, being arranged under the auspices of the Pedro Miguel Social and Recreative Club. A committee, consisting of Mesdames Barnes, Waters, Hobby, and Henderson, of the women's club, and Messrs. Henderson, Palmer, Pendry, Hobby, Bergeman, and Oldfield of the social club, was in charge of the arrangements. The center of interest was the Christmas tree, the gift of Mr. and Mrs. W. Henderson, which was attractively festooned with the usual Christmas decorations. About thirty children took part in the program and sang school songs and carols. The tree was lighted early in the evening and the gifts distributed, after which supper was served. Later in the evening a dance was given by the club, which lasted until a late hour. Special trains were run from Paraiso and Corozal. The club rooms were beautifully decorated. An elaborate supper was served at midnight and a delightful evening was enjoyed by all present. On the same evening a smoker was given by the bachelors at Paraiso.

The Sunday school of St. Luke's Church, Ancon, held its celebration, December 29, in the Protestant chapel in the hospital grounds. The celebration consisted of a short service and a short address by the chaplain, Archdeacon Bryan, the singing of carols by the children, and the distribution of gifts. All the children of Ancon, La Boca and Corozal were invited, and the attendance was good. There will be a service at this chapel on New Year's morning at 10 o'clock.

The Cristobal Club held its regular business meeting December 27, the president, Mrs. Lorin C. Collins being in the chair.

The club is making preparations for the Federation meeting on January 4 and will entertain the officers and delegates of the visiting clubs at luncheon at the Commission Hotel. In order to make the recognition of delegates more simple, it is desired that each delegate wear a badge upon entering the hall.

The Gorgona Woman's Club held its regular meeting December 26. In the absence of the president, Mrs. D. E. Hayes, secretary, presided. The meeting in the regular order should have been for the quarterly election of officers, but in the absence of several members and officers the elections did not take place.

The Las Cascadas Club held its regular meeting in the club room December 26. The entertainment committee served refreshments, and as a surprise, presented each member of the club with a little plate as a Christmas remembrance. The club has been actively preparing for the bazaar, which was held December 31. A general invitation to attend this entertainment had been extended and the attendance was satisfactory. The club did not have a share in the Christmas celebration, as trees were given by two other local organizations, both occasions being much enjoyed by the school children and others of the community. Members elected to attend the Federation meeting at Cristobal are the president, Mrs. Randall, Mrs. Lynn, Mrs. Drysdale, and Mrs. Boregard. It will be remembered that this club was not formed until after the organization of the Zone Federation of Women's Clubs, and it is not, therefore, a member of that body. Application for membership will be made at the coming meeting.

The Empire Woman's Club held its regular meeting December 19 with an unusually large attendance. The president, Mrs. F. W. Miracle, was in the chair, and the business proceeded in regular order. The application of ten resident women for admission to the club raises the membership list to nearly sixty. The meeting was a social one and the afternoon was spent informally. Refreshments were served by the committee under the chairmanship of Mrs. George T. Burnett. Mrs. E. Beck, the vice-president of the club, has returned to Empire after a short visit to Cristobal.

The Pedro Miguel Woman's Club has resumed activity and is enrolling new members at every meeting. A "clipping" social was given by the club December 21, which was very successful. After the sale of the "clippings," which netted a good sum for the benefit of the organization, supper and dancing were enjoyed by those present. The club will give a Japanese tea in honor of the Paraiso Woman's Club January 8. In the list of the club officers given by request in the last issue of the Canal Record, the name of the secretary of this club was not included. Mrs. H. W. Shick has been elected to that office.

The Ancon club held its business meeting on New Year's morning at 8.30 in the sun parlor of Hotel Tivoli. The committee on the dance to be given by the club announced that the only available date for the Tivoli ballroom is February 29. The ball will be a flower dance, and the ladies will appear in costume, each representing a flower. Invitations will be extended to other clubs in the Zone. The committee will have the arrangements completed in a short time.

ANCON AMUSEMENT ASSOCIATION.

FIRST STEP IN THE FORMATION OF A NEW ORGANIZATION.

The following invitation was circulated among all the residents of Ancon and Ancon Hospital:

You are invited to attend a mass meeting in the parlor of the Hotel Tivoli on Friday evening the 27th instant, at 8 o'clock, for the purpose of forming an amusement and improvement association for the benefit of the I. C. C. employees, and their families. It is earnestly hoped that all the employees of the I. C. C. quartered at Ancon, and Ancon Hospital, whether bachelor or married, will attend.

TOM. M. COOKE,
JOSEPH BUCKLIN BISHOP,
GEO. R. SHANTON,
H. D. REED,
W. C. GORGAS,
J. G. HOLCOMBE,
W. E. DEEKS,
Committee.

Pursuant to this call, about a hundred persons assembled in the parlor of the Hotel Tivoli on Friday evening. Col. Tom M. Cooke was unanimously chosen chairman of the meeting, and Mr. J. P. Avis, secretary. A prepared statement was read setting forth the purpose of the meeting, which in substance was, that as there was no association or club in the vicinity to procure amusement for the employees stationed there, it was considered advisable to form an association of the broadest scope possible, which could secure any and every form of entertainment which could amuse or improve the conditions of living. Such an association should arrange not only for indoor but outdoor entertainments, and all employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission and the Panama Railroad on the gold roll should be eligible to membership.

The chairman announced that in order to bring the subject properly before the meeting for discussion, a motion should be made.

Accordingly Mr. H. D. Reed moved that an Ancon Amusement and Improvement Association be formed. Several gentlemen spoke very enthusiastically in favor of it, among them Doctor Gruver and Mr. Lipsett, both stating that they thought such an association necessary, and that its scope should be of the broadest kind possible.

Judge Gudger favored an association so broad that it could provide any and every kind of amusement not forbidden by law. After further speeches, the motion was unanimously carried. It was then moved and seconded that the chair appoint a committee of nine, to include the chair, to draft a constitution and by-laws for the association, and that an adjourned meeting should be held on Saturday, January 4, at 8 p. m., in the parlor of the Hotel Tivoli, for the purpose of receiving the report of said committee and forming a permanent organization.

This motion having been carried, the chair announced that he would nominate the members of said committee later, as he considered it such an important thing that he desired to carefully consider the men selected.

A motion was then made and carried that the chair appoint a small committee to act as canvassers for the purpose of securing additional members who were not present at the meeting. In accordance with this motion the following gentlemen were appointed: Capt. George R. Shanton and Mr. J. M. Maguire, for Ancon and Panama; Mr. A. C. Harper and Mr. J. St. C. Hunt, for La Boca and East La Boca, and Mr. C. G. Haskel for Corozal.

Papers were then circulated to secure the signatures of those persons present who desired to join this association. The following signatures were secured:

Joseph Bucklin Bishop, W. E. Deeks, J. M. Maguire, J. A. Le Prince, E. C. McFarland, Fleetwood Gruver, W. T. Dozier, John Freeland, H. T. Summersgill, A. M. Colegrove, John S. Walker, Emil J. Rall, James O. Meadows, W. E. Russell, B. D. Radcliffe, W. B. Ruggles, E. J. Lewis, Edward Fitzpatrick, J. W. Belt, L. M. Lipsett, R. G. Baldwin, C. C.

Jackson, A. C. Harper, William W. Ruggles, M. L. Duff, Tom M. Cooke, H. R. Carter, K. K. Kramer, William E. Murtogh, A. E. Mayner, H. A. Gudger, J. W. Barrett, C. G. Haskell, J. L. Storla, W. Krugel, Harry M. Payne, J. P. Avis, Jere Turpin, Charles G. Thompson, H. B. May, R. A. Conard, Charles F. Runck, jr., L. R. Brown, H. E. Bovay, J. M. Shady, E. E. Price, F. E. Delano, D. H. Leftwich, S. A. Higgins, George F. Halsey, P. J. Mahoney, J. St. C. Hunt, Frederick A. Feld, William E. Maxon, Robert Coe, and W. C. Haskins.

Colonel Cooke subsequently announced the following committee on constitution and by-laws, stating that it was his endeavor to, so far as possible, represent each locality and all branches of the service:

Tom M. Cook, chairman; T. C. Lyster, Ancon Hospital; W. E. Grant, municipal engineering; A. C. Harper, engineer; W. E. Russell, building and construction; William Krugel, material and supplies; J. M. Maguire, labor, quarters, and subsistence; J. Kyte, Corozal; J. St. C. Hunt, Panama Railroad and La Boca.

The movement appears to have met with hearty approval, and a successful organization seems to be assured.

It is the desire of all concerned that at the meeting on January 4, at 8 p. m., in the parlor of the Hotel Tivoli, every employee of the Commission and Panama Railroad stationed in Ancon, Ancon Hospital, Panama, La Boca, East La Boca, and Corozal shall be present.

CRISTOBAL GARRISON, REGULAR ARMY AND NAVY UNION.

The Canal Record: The third garrison of the Regular Army and Navy Union of the United States of America was installed at Cristobal, Canal Zone, Wednesday evening, the 18th instant, by Mr. Lester E. Monk, paymaster; Paul Wollenburger, surgeon; Fred. M. Kaulbach, officer of the day; Lewis B. Mickle, officer of the watch; Joseph J. Marek, officer of the guard.

It is the intention of Mr. Herman to have three garrisons on the Isthmus. One has been installed at Culebra, covering the district between that place and Panama, including La Boca. The garrison now located at Empire (Admiral Asa Walker, No. 40) will be transferred to Gorgona, taking in all towns between Gatun and Culebra. The Cristobal garrison will cover the territory between Gatun and Colon.

Men who have served in the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States are eligible to enrollment. Application blanks for Cristobal garrison can be obtained by applying to Mr. H. V. H. Monk, Gatun, or the undersigned. The next regular meeting has been ordered for Friday, December 27, 1907, at 7.30 p. m., in the court room, No. 1 Building, Cristobal, Canal Zone.

Very respectfully,

WM. M. RIDPATH,
Adjutant and Quartermaster.

This applies in like manner to those who are members of the organization and affiliated with some tribe in the States. In case of accident or sickness, these members would be known as such, and could have the additional assistance of the nearest tribe and its members. Do this at the next meeting of a tribe near whom you are resident—attend; show your credentials and receipts; register your name, occupation, and address; give any additional information thought necessary. Your attendance will be appreciated. The good will and benefit you receive will be shown by your future attendance.

VACCINATION.

To all concerned:

In order to properly enforce the vaccination ordinance and at the same time to accommodate employees returning from their vacation and in order to prevent unnecessary vaccination and friction resulting therefrom, this circular is to inform such employees that only a vaccination that has taken in recent years is required, and all persons who have been successfully vaccinated, in the opinion of the quarantine officer, can secure a certificate to that effect, which will remain effective and be accepted as evidence in this particular for a period of three years. This certificate will be accepted by the surgeons on the Panama Railroad steamers as evidence of immunity, and it will not be necessary to revaccinate persons having such certificate.

This certificate of vaccination can be secured from the quarantine officer of Colon, and the quarantine officer at Panama, but applicants for the same will be required to show such scars of vaccination before this certificate is granted.

C. C. McCULLOCH, Jr.,
Acting Chief Sanitary Officer.

ANCON, CANAL ZONE, November 23.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, the statement read by the Senator from Texas is misleading as to the character of this newspaper, and he is wandering entirely from the subject that was raised as to the salary of Mr. Bishop and his duties upon the Isthmus. His duties were made entirely clear to the committee by Colonel Goethals in his testimony before that committee. He said that Mr. Bishop was brought there for the purpose of taking charge of the bureau of complaints, so as to relieve him of the burden of listening to the complaints that are constantly being made.

Colonel Goethals also stated that a Miss Beeks, who was the representative of the Civic Federation, came there representing the Christian people of this country to learn of the condition of the employees there and see if proper care was being given them. It was her suggestion that some method should be provided for the purpose of giving forth the information which is contained in this paper that is criticised by the Senator from Texas.

Colonel Goethals says that instead of assigning Mr. Bishop to this duty he found a young man on the Isthmus who had newspaper experience and suggested to him to start this paper.

Mr. President, it appears from the statements made not only by this witness but by several others that the information which is contained in the periodical or newspaper is of great benefit not only to the employees upon the Isthmus but, as was stated by ex-Senator Blackburn, of great benefit to the people in the United States.

There is no evidence that there is any material added expense by the publication of this paper. No extra salary is paid to Mr. Bishop. There is no other expense than purely the cost of the paper.

I certainly hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas will be voted down.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas proposes an amendment, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 43, line 14, after the word "dollars" strike out the semicolon, insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the purpose of the publication of a newspaper in the Canal Zone.

The amendment was rejected.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill on page 43, line 15, and read to line 21.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as we have passed over the portion of the bill which relates to the Executive Departments I desire to ask the Senator from Maine a question. I am not on the Appropriations Committee, as is known, of course, to Senators, and I may be mistaken in my recollection, but if I am not mistaken, in the last Congress an amendment was put upon an appropriation bill prohibiting Executive Departments from incurring any liability in their several Departments for which an appropriation was not previously made. Of course we understand that a deficiency bill is one which makes provision for the payment of liabilities incurred, for the payment of which the regular appropriation bill has been found to be insufficient.

I simply desire to ask the Senator from Maine (and I have no information on the subject, certainly nothing more than general rumor) whether any of the items of appropriations which we have already passed over are appropriations for liabilities incurred by any of the Departments in violation of that provision of law.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, there are two very important provisions of the law, one passed in 1905 and the other in 1906, known as the Hemenway and the Tawney provisions. The occasion for their passage was the piling up of immense deficiencies. It was the object of these statutes to prevent the Departments from exceeding the authority given to them for the expenditure of money by appropriations. They are found in the general deficiency act and in the urgent deficiency act of those years. The first provides that—

No Department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract or obligation for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations—unless such contract or obligation is authorized by law.

I think I may say that I wish that provision had not been put in, but it is in, and it is in the subsequent act. There this provision was keyed up and made a little stronger, but there is the same exception, that no Department shall involve the Government in expenditures beyond appropriations made in the annual bills, unless such contract or obligation is authorized by law.

When the other branch of the legislature——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the unfinished business be informally laid aside.

Mr. HEYBURN. Until the disposition of the bill now under consideration.

Mr. HALE. Yes, until the disposition of the appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. HALE. When the other branch of Congress was confronted with the deficiencies which are incorporated in this bill it was also confronted with a provision in the Revised Statutes which I am bound to say escaped my consideration when these acts were passed, and it probably escaped the observation of the framers of the acts. It is found in the Revised Statutes, and is as follows:

> No contract or purchase on behalf of the United States shall be made, unless the same is authorized by law or is under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment.

If it stopped there we should be all right; neither the Army nor the Navy could make deficiencies; but there is this exception, which is the law:

> Except in the War and Navy Departments, for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation, which, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current year.

That is the existing law, and it authorizes the expenditure of money for these excepted purposes in these two Departments. It is under that exception of the different classes of expenditures in the Army and Navy that are found the provisions in this deficiency appropriation bill.

The original provision dates back very far in the past. It was first passed in 1861.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Suppose Congress in 1861 passed a law providing that these expenditures should not be made except when authorized by an act of Congress and excepted the Navy and War Departments, and Congress in 1896 passed another statute providing how expenditures shall be made, is it not true that the provision inserted in the appropriation act of 1896 repeals the old statute, the law of 1861?

Mr. HALE. I doubt it.

Mr. CLAY. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Mr. HALE. At any rate, the House took the other view. I should have been glad to take the view suggested by the Senator, but here was an old statute passed in 1861, which is embodied and incorporated to-day in the body of the Revised Statutes that are the existing law.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, I will state that I do not intend to oppose these appropriations. I understand that already nearly $4,000,000 has been expended by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, most of it for the purpose of equipping our fleet for the Pacific coast. Now, I am in favor of paying it, but it is clear to me that the statute has been strained in order to authorize the War and the Navy Departments to spend $4,000,000 when the expenditure was not authorized by an act of Congress. I believe it to be a dangerous practice to let the War Department, the Navy Department, or any other Department of the Government expend four or five million dollars when no provision has been made by Congress for its expenditure.

I will say to the Senator if there is any doubt in regard to the law I believe Congress ought to change it and provide that the same rule shall apply to the War Department and the Navy Department that applies to other Departments. I believe myself that the old statute has been repealed by reason of recent legislation enacted by Congress in 1896, contained in an appropriation act.

Mr. HALE. The provision in the bill, made by the House of Representatives, which originates all these bills, proceeds upon the other assumption. I may say that when the next deficiency bill is reported by the body that originates it—the provisions that I have read having originated in that body—I should hope and I believe provision will be made that will cure the difficulty we are under now. At any rate, as the Senator knows, we went upon the assumption in the Committee on Appropriations that we had to pay these bills. A good deal of money has already been expended. We can not hold it up. It is a doubtful question whether the provisions do repeal in terms the exceptions applicable to these two Departments. I shall hope that this Congress will not pass without a provision being incorporated upon the deficiency appropriation bill by the body that originated the original propositions which will take care of the trouble that we find ourselves in now.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to call the Senator's attention to another practice that I believe to be a bad one. Certainly the Departments ought not to be allowed to appropriate money for the purpose of carrying on the business of the Government. That is a business which belongs to Congress.

As a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I remember that we appropriated during the last session of Congress about $112,000,000 to pay the expenses of the Post-Office Department, and now in this bill we have one item of $750,000 for compensation to clerks at first and second class offices, and the item of that Department for the First Assistant's office in this bill amounts to over $1,000,000.

My recollection is that when the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was making a careful study of the amount of money necessary to run the Post-Office Department through the last fiscal year the question came up before our committee, How many extra clerks will be needed and what compensation will be needed? And the estimates of the amount of money needed by that Department were appropriated by Congress and passed upon by the Senate and became a law.

The practice of going before a special committee where a bill belongs and securing apparently all that is needed for the purpose of running the Department and then afterwards going before the Appropriations Committee and securing much more without the special committee to which the subject belongs knowing anything about it, in my judgment, is a bad practice. I am frank to confess that I was surprised when the Appropriations Committee was called upon to give $750,000 for this item when the identical question was discussed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and the entire request of the Department granted.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I agree with a great deal that the Senator from Georgia has said. If no money was spent on contracts made or obligations entered into outside of the estimates and appropriations, there never would be any deficiencies, but the working of an immense Goverment like this is not so exact as that. Just as the Senator says, representatives of the Department appeared before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and the committee recommended the appropriation of the money they asked for. They did not anticipate the calls that would be made on the Department. They did not look ahead far enough. This was all thrashed out in the hearings on the pending bill before the House committee, and it was explained there. It was said:

> The deficit has been increased since then to $450,000. It will be increased on April 1 by the promotion of clerks who have served a year in a grade. Under the new salary law they were advanced a hundred dollars each in salary. Then we will be compelled to appoint some additional clerks between now and the close of the fiscal year, which will bring the deficit up somewhere to the neighborhood of $750,000.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, I will state that the very question discussed before the committee in the House was discussed before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and the appropriation was made for the increase, just as was stated in the hearings. I am frank to confess that I can not understand why the proper amount was not included in the Post-Office appropriation bill at that time, and it is a matter that is worthy the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before the Senator from Georgia takes his seat I wish to ask him a question. Does not the Senator remember that when the appropriations were being considered before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads the First Assistant Postmaster-General could not make a definite estimate as to the extra amount of money that would be needed for additional clerk hire, carriers, rural carriers, and matters of that kind? It is only an estimate. The increased postal service accounts for every dollar that is provided for in this bill.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to say to the Senator——

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment. Take the city of Chicago alone. In order to facilitate the transmission of the mails through that city and over the city the Post-Office Department was required to allow more than 300 additional clerks over what was had at the time the First Assistant Postmaster-General was before the committee.

Mr. CLAY. I was upon the subcommittee of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and we went to the Post-Office Department to hear the story of the First Assistant Postmaster-General. I remember well not only an original estimate was made of the amount of increases, but a supplementary report was filed, and I feel sure that we gave to the First Assistant Postmaster-General and the Department practically everything that he asked. I am unable, and I have thus far been unable, to find any good reason why this deficiency occurred.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator will allow me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator will remember it was only an estimate on his part, and experience has demonstrated that his estimate was not large enough; that he did not appreciate at the time the development in our postal service and the needs of such great cities as Chicago, San Francisco, and the cities of the East, like Philadelphia, Boston, and New York.

Mr. CLAY. I am aware of the fact that the Senator from Illinois has asked a good deal for the city of Chicago before that committee, and he has always gotten it. I never knew him to ask anything yet that he did not get. I do not say he ever asked for anything that he did not deserve to get, but I say that every appropriation for maintaining the Post-Office Department for the last ten years has more than doubled, and the Post-Office Department in a period of ten more years, the way we are going, will cost the people of the United States $225,000,000 per year. I would not be surprised to see the Navy Department cost the people of the United States in less than half a dozen years $175,000,000 per year Unless we guard the public Treasury and unless we scrutinize every single estimate made by the Department with a view of cutting down expenses, there is no telling where our expenditures will reach.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think no one can be overconcerned as to the direction deficiency bills may sometimes take and the danger of allowing them to grow in size or expand in latitude and authority; but I think it is a fact that we have always had deficiency bills; furthermore, that we shall always have them, and that the different Departments of the Government could not properly transact their great business unless there were some elasticity permitted in these matters.

I think I ought to say, however, before we pass from this deficiency bill, which is one of the largest we have had, that so far as the Army shortage is concerned the Senate ought to take its part of the blame, and the House of Representatives ought to take its part of the blame. We provide by law what pay the soldier shall get. We provide by law for his clothing and his subsistence, etc. They are regular annual or monthly allowances. The soldier has enlisted for a term of years, and therefore has a contract with the Government.

Now, turning to the statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], I think we will all have to admit that when we provide by law that the soldier shall be enlisted for a three-years' term of service and during that time shall receive so many dollars per month pay, that he shall receive so much for his rations and clothing——

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I do not want the Senator from Wyoming to understand from anything that I have said that I am against increasing to some extent the pay of our soldiers.

Mr. WARREN. I do not understand that. It was to another point I was addressing myself.

Mr. CLAY. There is much merit in that feature of the legislation, and I am not prepared to say that I shall oppose it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want to give my idea of the law, with all due deference to the Senator from Georgia. I think that the courts will always find that contracts by the Government for the pay and subsistence of the soldier shall be paid, whether this or that Congress shall fail to appropriate the money or not. That is my judgment upon that point. We provide for a certain number of soldiers, that they shall have a certain amount of pay, a certain amount of subsistence, and a certain amount of clothing. We have the estimates coming here. The House of Representatives, on the other side, fails to allow the amount; the bill comes here, and if we fail to allow it, there is a shortage. Of course, under the law which the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has quoted, the Department proceeds to pay the troops and to furnish the subsistence and supplies.

Last year, I may say in extenuation of this large deficit, which I am sorry to see, the Army bill did not carry any appropriation for the extra transportation and extra expense of the Army caused by the Cuban occupation. At that time it was thought possible that by the commencement of the present fiscal year, or before we were far along in it, the cause of that expense might be removed or lessened. So the entire matter of providing extra expense for the Cuban occupation was left out of the appropriation for the Army. That amount in a year is nearly $2,000,000; and, of course, it constitutes a large portion of the present Army deficiency.

Another cause of the deficiency is that last year we passed an act enlarging the Army in its artillery branch. When we asked for estimates of what it would cost in clothing, supplies, etc., they were rendered to the Senate, and we failed to supply the necessary appropriation by nearly $1,400,000. The deficiency bill of last year, in which we were called upon to furnish over a million and a quarter dollars for regular supplies, was cut $500,000, and the appropriation for clothing and equipage was cut over $870,500. In entering upon this fiscal year, take forage, for instance: The cutting down of the appropriation for that item last year cut down, and in fact completely exhausted, the amount of forage in stock. We had to go upon the market on the 1st of July, when the crops were not grown, when farmers were not able to say what the prices would be at the time for making contracts, which made necessary their placing the risks of contracts at higher figures. So the Army was compelled to pay higher prices. Had we appropriated more liberally in time, as desired by the Department, we would have saved much money. In the matter of prices for supplies furnished, we are under obligation to furnish to our animals a certain amount of forage and to furnish our men a certain amount of subsistence. The rise in price in these commodities is often unforeseen, and I think that as to these commodities we all will freely admit that during the last year the increase in price has been exceptionally large. For instance, in the matter of coal for the Army, it costs over $870,000 more for the same amount of coal than it cost the year before and would have cost at the time the estimate was made, the price per hundredweight having increased from $0.2523 to $0.3113, or nearly 25 per cent.

In the matter of clothing the amount to be appropriated is frequently cut in the regular appropriation bill upon the ground that there is clothing in stock. When it comes in as a matter of deficiency it is not really a deficiency, because it is clothing in stock; but when we come to the 1st of July without having any clothing in stock, we are at a great disadvantage and lose much money, because in order to buy clothing cheaply the Government regulation cloth for the clothing and the clothing itself must be manufactured under contract, and that can not be done unless the funds are provided.

The rise in forage during the year and since the estimates for the year were made was even greater than in fuel, i. e., from $0.7768 to $1.0843, or nearly 40 per cent.

I do not believe the amount allowed for forage in this bill is enough to take the Army through to July 1, 1908, and more will quite likely have to be provided in a later deficiency bill.

I admit that the last year's deficiency for the Army has been largely enhanced by our own fault in not appropriating sufficient money to provide for a supply of subsistence and clothing and a supply of fuel and forage on hand.

In the matter of the expense in Cuba, it was understood by the Committee on Military Affairs that there would be a deficiency.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Legislative," on page 43, after line 22, to insert:

Mr. HALE. On page 22, line 3, before the name "Copenhaver," I move to insert the initials "W. A."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, line 3, before the name "Copenhaver," it is proposed to insert the initials "W. A.," so as to read:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to pay voucher in favor of W. A. Copenhaver, Washington, D. C., for embossing 2,000 sheets of note paper and 2,000 envelopes, $11.25, from the appropriation for contingent expenses, Navy Department, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 23, after line 11, I move to insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, after line 11, it is proposed to insert:

Bureau of Supplies and Accounts: For the following for the balance of the fiscal year 1908, namely, two chief bookkeepers at the rate of $2,000 each per annum; two clerks of class 2; in all $2,833.35, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. That is all, Mr. President.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I rise to make the point of order against the amendment which has been inserted on page 8, from line 3 to line 16, inclusive, that it proposes general legislation. This amendment, Mr. President, directs the Secretary of the Treasury not to do a thing which the sundry civil appropriation act of 1907 directed him to do. It also proposes that the Committee on the Library shall have powers which by law they do not now possess, and the amendment is not germane to anything contained in the bill.

I might say in elucidation of this point, Mr. President, that in the last appropriation bill, as this amendment upon its face recites——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that he reserve his point of order until the bill shall have been reported to the Senate.

Mr. KNOX. Very well.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to be inserted in line 16, page 13.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, after line 16, it is proposed to insert:

For an additional amount to enable the Secretary of War to complete the improvement of Grays Harbor and Chehalis River, Washington, with a view to securing a channel 200 feet wide and 18 feet deep at mean low water, as contemplated by the act approved March 2, 1907, covering this project, $60,000.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I should like to say a word on the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am constrained to make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. PILES. I can explain the proposition briefly, if the Senator will permit me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HALE. I withhold the point of order for the moment.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I would not ask that this amendment be inserted in this bill, because I recognize the character of the bill, if it were not for a very urgent necessity. At the last session some $177,000 was appropriated for the purpose of straightening and deepening the channel of Grays Harbor, in connection with the Chehalis River, making it 200 feet wide and 18 feet deep. After the preliminary estimate and survey had been made, the channel was filled up to a certain extent, and the amount appropriated was found insufficient to keep the channel on the lines provided for by existing law. The work is being done under the continuing contract system. The dredge and all the appliances are engaged on this waterway, and are at work at the present time, but by reason of the insufficiency of the appropriation, the waterway, instead of being made 200 feet wide, is now being constructed with a width along part of its course of 170 feet and along other parts with a width of 100 feet, and the depth is being considerably shoaled.

This is one of the greatest shipping points we have on the Pacific coast. The largest lumber mills on the coast are located there, and it will necessitate the expenditure of a larger sum of money hereafter if the Government does not provide in this bill for the appropriation which I now seek. The dredges and other appliances now at work will be withdrawn about the 1st of March, and if this appropriation can not be provided for on this bill, the Government will later on, in order to make the improvements which have been provided for, with the width and depth of channel proposed, will be compelled to expend from $30,000 to $60,000 more than it would now cost if the work should proceed on the present plan. For that reason I hope the Senator from Maine will not make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I wish I could yield to the suggestion of the Senator, but I am trying to keep the bill as closely as possible to its purpose. The amendment is clearly subject to the point of order, as it proposes an entirely new plan for expending money.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendments made to the bill as in Committee of the Whole will be considered as agreed to, with the exception of the amendment on page 8, which has been reserved by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of the one noted, are agreed to.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I now renew the point of order that I made while the bill was before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and for the reasons then assigned.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the point of order raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The point of order is:

That the amendment proposes general legislation:
First. Because it directs the Secretary of the Treasury not to do that which the law says he shall do.
Second. Because it confers a power on the Committee on the Library that under the law does not exist.
Third. It is not germane to anything in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is clearly of the opinion——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I hope this provision will not go out; but of course it is subject to the ruling of the Chair. It is a provision which was inserted in the other House by the committee having charge of the bill and, so far as I can discover from the debate, was not contested on its merits, but went out on a point of order. The managers of the bill on the part of the House were very desirous that the amendment should be put in the bill, in order that it might go into conference, and the Senate committee has put it in. I am satisfied the facts are such that it ought to remain in the bill.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I think a plain statement of the facts connected with this item will indicate that it is properly in the bill. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is of the impression that it undertakes to require the Secretary of the Treasury not to do a thing which the law requires him to do. In point of fact, this little appropriation reveals a very quaint situation.

A learned professor, I think in Pennsylvania, proposed to Congress to collect the authentic manuscripts of certain ancient charters and constitutions. Afterwards, as I understand, he took in with him in the enterprise a very learned student of history in the State University of my own State, with mutual contracts and agreements as to the labor of compiling these documents. The two disagreed because the character of the material collected was not satisfactory to the Iowa professor. This publication, which has now, as I understand, been printed, purports to be a collection of these old charters and documents. In point of fact, it is a reprint of a book issued many years ago by Ben: Perley Poore, and this printing has been done not from certified copies of original manuscripts, but from the printed pages of a work already in existence. I am informed that it is not an accurate reprint of the documents at all; that it is full of errors and omissions, and is of no earthly value either as a legal or as a historical work. The Treasury Department, finding no authority authorized by law to pass upon the authenticity of the documents, holds it is not required by law to pay for it, but has refused altogether to pay and, as I understand, will continue to so refuse until evidence is produced that the printed matter is the thing Congress agreed to pay for or is passed upon by some authorized person.

Now, it appears to me there ought to be an immediate provision made for the correction of the errors in these ancient documents and some authority created to pass upon their authenticity. When that is done the money ought to be paid. But it certainly is a bad situation to be paying $10,000 for a publication which is in no sense an authentic reprint of any ancient constitutions or charters such as Congress intended to have printed. This work is worthless unless its accuracy is unquestionable. Neither the Pennsylvania professor nor the Government can afford to put their names on a defective and incomplete publication of this sort. It not only throws away the money, but puts all parties in a bad light. It is an unnecessary situation, since the certified transcripts of these documents are now in the hands of the Iowa expert, to whose connection with this work I have alluded.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I do not exactly see the relevancy of the suggestions upon the merits to the parliamentary question raised by my point of order. Neither do I intend to enter into a discussion as to the merits between a distinguished professor in Iowa and a distinguished professor in Pennsylvania.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the Senator will pardon me, I understood his point of order to be based upon the fact that the amendment requires the Treasury Department not to do what the law now requires it to do.

Mr. KNOX. That is one of the reasons assigned. The point of order is that it is general legislation.

But, Mr. President, I think I would be remiss, probably, if I did not state that the situation is not quite so difficult as my friend, the Senator from Iowa, has suggested. The Congress in 1907 passed an act appropriating $10,000 for payment to the compiler of this work. There was no condition at all imposed in that act. The work was not to be subjected to the supervision of the Committee on the Library, nor was the Secretary of the Treasury authorized to withhold payment until anyone passed upon the quality of the work. However, the Secretary of the Treasury having ascertained what my friend, the Senator from Iowa, has stated to the Senate, that there was some difficulty about this work, that probably it was not so thorough or so accurate as it might be, made a law unto himself. He overlooked entirely the fact that the appropriation was unconditional, and he absolutely declined to pay this bill; and I am not criticising him for it at all.

But Professor Thorpe, with a law of Congress at his back and a stubborn Treasurer in front of him, did the only thing that he could have done under the circumstances. He took advantage of the position in which Congress placed him, and he went into the courts, and by an appropriate proceeding in mandamus he asked that the Secretary of the Treasury be compelled to pay him for his work, in accordance with the provisions of the law. The Secretary of the Treasury filed an answer to the petition for mandamus, and in the answer he set up the defects in this work, whereupon Professor Thorpe demurred to the answer, which to all lawyers means simply that Professor Thorpe said by that demurrer, "notwithstanding the defects in this work, I am entitled to my $10,000." Upon that demurrer the court overruled Professor Thorpe, and the whole question is now before the court on its merits, where it should be, under the circumstances.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I doubt whether the Senator from Pennsylvania can make his point in the form in which it appears. The third point made is that it is not germane. If that point is insisted upon, under the rules the Senate must decide it. The first point is that it is general legislation. The last is that it is not germane. The rule says that where the point that an amendment is not germane is raised, it must be referred by the Presiding Officer to the Senate.

Mr. KNOX. I am entirely willing to reply upon the first ground suggested in the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment proposes general legislation, and is therefore obnoxious to the rule. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order for the first reason assigned by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

OTIS C. MOONEY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 39) to correct the military record of Otis C. Mooney.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of War to correct the military record of Otis C. Mooney, late private of Company K, Eighth Vermont Infantry Volunteers, and grant him an honorable discharge as of date May 18, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVISION OF THE PENAL LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the bill has been read, and read the second time by section, and considered except as to twenty-eight sections of one class, which were passed over for further consideration at the request of Senators. Then there are eight sections which were passed over that carry with them a single feature of legislation. Then chapter 10, which relates to slavery, was passed over, with the understanding that the sections which were passed over would be taken up for independent consideration.

I will say to the Senators that the sections passed over have been printed separately; and if they are not already on their desks, the officers of the floor are preparing to hand them to each Senator. I will ask that these sections be taken up now in their order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I want to recall to the attention of the Senator the fact that the understanding was not simply that these particular sections which are now brought to the attention of the Senate by him should be subject to be called up for action, but the statement was made by the Senator, or I think made by the Chair and concurred in by the Senator, that the understanding was that each section which had been passed would still be open for any criticism or objection that might be made thereto.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was the understanding.

Mr. BACON. I state that, because there are some sections to which I shall ask the attention of the Senate which are not included in the republished bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Georgia correctly states the understanding, but I think also the understanding was that we would first take up those that were passed with the more express understanding that they would be considered first.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Section 5 is the first.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the first section passed over.

Mr. HEYBURN. Those sections have all been read. Is it the desire that they be read again?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate recurs to the section, which the Chair understands has heretofore been read, in order that it may be passed upon for purposes of amendment or such other action as the Senate desires to take.

The SECRETARY. Section 5, on page 3, is the first section that was passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no amendment proposed, the Secretary will proceed to the next section.

Mr. BACON. I do not like to make any suggestion which will cause delay in the proceedings, but it is impossible for any Senator to carry in his mind a correct understanding of each one of these sections. There are a great many of them. Here is a pamphlet of probably a hundred pages. A great many of them are long sections, and some of them are sections that were possibly passed over at the suggestion of one Senator and some at the suggestion of another, and at the time they were passed over there was no consideration given to them at all, at least as to some of them, and unless the sections are read again it will be impossible for me—I speak for no one but myself——

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not ask that they be not read. I was merely endeavoring to start off with an explicit understanding.

Mr. BACON. I understood from the direction the Presiding Officer gave that in the absence of some objection they would not be read.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not so understand.

Mr. BACON. I may have misunderstood the Chair.

Mr. HEYBURN. I supposed they would be read as they are reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is all within the control of the Senate. The Secretary will read the section now under consideration.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 5. Every citizen of the United States, whether actually resident or abiding within the same, or in any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or in any foreign country, without the permission or authority of the Government, directly or indirectly, commences or carries on any verbal or written correspondence or intercourse with any foreign government or any officer or agent thereof, with an intent to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government or of any officer or agent thereof, in relation to any disputes or controversies with the United States, or to defeat the measures of the Government of the United States; and every person, being a citizen of or resident within the United States or in any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, and not duly authorized, counsels, advises, or assists in any such correspondence with such intent, shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than three years; but nothing in this section shall be construed to abridge the right of a citizen to apply, himself or his agent, to any foreign government or the agents thereof for redress of any injury which he may have sustained from such government or any of its agents or subjects.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, this section is enlarged so as to apply to jurisdiction added since the enactment of the original law, and I think it may be fairly said that there is no other change of existing law than the addition of the words "or in any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof." It was passed over before Senators, I think, really comprehended the plan under which this work was presented to the Senate, and I do not remember that any special objection was made further than the inquiry as to the meaning of those words and the purpose of their adoption by the committee.

It must be obvious that the provisions of this law should extend to any place under the jurisdiction of the United States. Otherwise we would permit this kind of an offense in one portion of our jurisdiction and not permit it in another. So, unless there is some special objection other than that interposed before, the section seems to me to be existing law.

Mr. BACON. I do not know at whose instance the section was passed over. I was not present in the Senate when it was done. Can the Senator inform me?

Mr. HEYBURN. My recollection is that it was passed over at the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. But it was done in rather a casual way because it was a new provision, and at that time considerable discussion was had as to whether or not every section containing any italics was not new legislation because of the fact that it was a change of existing law. We had not, as I say, arrived at so complete an understanding as to the plan upon which the work of the committee was presented.

Mr. BACON. I want to make a suggestion to the Senator. This is properly denominated a revision of the law, and where there is no change made, of course, we in no manner, by failing to take action in regard thereto, commit ourselves to the propriety of the law and in no manner do we reenact it. But wherever any change is made at all, even an immaterial change, if we adopt it we practically reenact the statute. So it is before us for challenge necessarily. We reenact it if we make the change of a word.

This is a question to which I have not had my attention directed before the reading of the section at this particular moment, but it strikes me as being a section that I would not be willing to give my consent to as a part of the law of the United States; and I think that wherever we find a section that we are not willing to give our consent to or our approval of, we ought to be slow to pass it in that shape. I note by looking at the original law that it is a statute passed in 1799, during the Administration of the elder Adams. While it is not a part of the alien and sedition law, it appears to me to be very close kin to legislation of that kind, which, as we know, created a tremendous furore in this country and fell under the condemnation of the people of the United States. The terms of this law, it seems to me, are such that a citizen in the pursuit of the protection of his own interest might incur a very heavy penalty, to say nothing of the trouble and expense of a prosecution. If I read it aright, if the Government of the United States was in correspondence or negotiation with the British Government about a matter between the United States and Canada—treaties having been made, of course, with the parent Government, the British Government—although the treaty might relate to a business matter in which a citizen of the United States was very closely interested, it would be a felony, punishable by a grievous penalty, if that citizen were to communicate in any way with any of the authorities of the British Government looking to an adjustment, which, while it might not be the adjustment desired by the United States Government, might be an adjustment which was to his business interest. Do I misconstrue the law, I will ask the Senator from Idaho, because I have had to read it very hastily, of course?

Mr. HEYBURN. This provision, adopted at the very beginning of our Government, was to prevent just such happenings as occurred with reference to a certain diplomatic officer representing France in the United States at that time.

Mr. BACON. I recollect it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Perhaps the Senator will recall the circumstances.

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. The necessity arose out of the embarrassments, I think, that surrounded the situation in that case. I merely use it as an instance. His presence in this country was declared throughout our Department of State to be against the best interests of the Government. He retired in his diplomatic capacity and returned in his individual capacity to keep up the same agitation.

Mr. President, this is the existing law, and the committee, whether they approve of its measures or not, did not stop to consider. The only change made by the committee was the adaptation of that law of long standing to existing conditions. No change was made in the law. The additional words simply go to the territorial limits of the jurisdiction. I think there is no change at all that goes to the purpose or effect of the law. Under these circumstances I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that it would not be wise for us to enter upon a consideration of the wisdom of legislation represented by existing law. Otherwise we would have to consider the reenactment of all the law before us in this report.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not entirely agree with the Senator from Idaho in regard to that, because I have some other sections in my mind which I think ought to be eliminated instead of getting the renewed approval of the Congress of the United States—sections which were passed in the heat of great political excitement and which ought no longer to be upon the statute book.

But, recurring to this particular section, if there is a law that is grossly unjust and liable to work great hardship upon a citizen of the United States, and we so find it, we ought not to reenact it. If it is a section that has no change in it, we have it within our proper jurisdiction at this time, it seems to me, to elminate it from the law if we find it to be an objectionable one.

Let us look at this particular statute and see how very harsh it is. It does not simply make it a felony for a citizen of this country to communicate in any way with the officers of a foreign government for the purpose of defeating the measures of the United States, but it makes it a felony for him to communicate upon the subject-matter which is in process of negotiation between the two countries. Let me read it. But before reading it I want to say another word in regard to the suggestion of the Senator as to the cause which first gave rise to this statute. The party to whom he referred was a citizen of France, and this statute is leveled against citizens of the United States. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not accurately advised as to the facts, but my recollection is that he came back here with the declared intention in that very early day when the intention was all practically that was necessary of becoming a citizen of this country. However, I merely cite it as an instance of the probable cause for this legislation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I recall the circumstances under which this act was passed, it was passed in 1799, and it was at that time called the "Logan Act." It was passed because a citizen of this country, Dr. George Logan, at the time when the relations between France and this country were somewhat strained, went to France ostensibly upon some other business and meddled in the question of the relations between this country and France, to the very great embarrassment of this Government, and because of the embarrassment which resulted from that, this act was passed.

Mr. BACON. I misunderstood the reference of the Senator from Idaho. The incident I had in mind was the case of the representative of the French Government, who about that time became persona non grata on account of similar interference here. But I did not have in mind the instance to which the Senator from Utah now alludes, which would put it directly in the line of this legislation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was the direct cause of the legislation, and at that time it was called the "Logan Act."

Mr. BACON. Now, to recur to the terms of this statute—

SEC. 5. Every citizen of the United States, whether actually resident or abiding within the same, or in any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or in any foreign country, without the permission or authority of the Government, directly or indirectly, commences or carries on any verbal or written correspondence or intercourse with any foreign government or any officer or agent thereof, with an intent to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government or of any officer or agent thereof, in relation to any disputes or controversies with the United States—

That is complete in itself. Then it goes on to say—or to defeat the measures of the Government of the United States.

So this statute makes it a felony, with a grave penalty, for any citizen of the United States to get into communication with any officer of a foreign government as to any matter between this Government and that government then in negotiation between them.

I do not know how we are to proceed with the consideration of this matter with simply—I will not say how many Senators present—but certainly not two-thirds of the Senate present. I do not know how we are to proceed in the discussion and determination of these grave matters without the consensus of a sufficient number of the Senate to show that it is having proper attention. So long as we were going on as we have heretofore in the consideration of sections of the Revised Statutes to which there was no particular objection, that was one thing, but when the matters which are controverted and which were left over come up to be decided it seems to me we should have some little better understanding than we have now as to the method under which we are to proceed.

I have endeavored to make myself understood without putting myself in a position to embarrass the Senator from Idaho and his colleague, the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I know to what the Senator from Georgia refers, of course. I would be glad to have the presence of a larger number of Senators when these controverted sections are under consideration. I also realize the embarrassment that would follow from making a suggestion. If the statutes of the United States are to be revised at all, it can only be done by a general consent on the part of Senators either to be present or else to take no advantage of the fact that they are not present. That is evident. Under the rules of this body it is possible absolutely to defeat the revision of the laws, as that measure has been defeated and postponed for so long a period. A resort to any form of parliamentary tactics that would delay this bill simply means to abandon the work of many, many years, and I am quite confident that no Senator would want to render nugatory the work that is before the Senate in the shape of this bill.

So I will have to appeal to Senators to waive objections that go only to existing law. It would not be possible to revise and codify these laws in any length of time that would be at our disposal if we are to enter upon the consideration of the wisdom of the legislation of those who have gone before us. That must be evident, because this bill contains the result of the legislation of a century and more and an amount of discussion and consideration that could not be stated.

So it is evident that unless the Senate is of the temper and in the mind to allow existing law to take its chances for reformation in the nature of original legislation under the rules of this body through the standing committees of the body we might just as well abandon any attempt to revise these laws.

I should like to consider this question fully at this time and settle upon a policy, because we are expending a great deal of labor and a considerable amount of public moneys in preparing other titles of the law for consideration in this body with a view of revising and codifying it. If we are to meet with the objections that might be urged against existing law because Senators differ in their opinion with the wisdom which enacted that law, we might just as well at the beginning know it and cease all of this work, because in a few days we will be ready to report the Title of the Judiciary, which involves more controverted questions than are involved in this criminal code, and which involves a class of questions which will appeal more closely to the members of this body than do those pertaining to the criminal law.

If we start in to revise the laws of the United States with the understanding that we will not attempt original legislation, that our efforts shall be confined to the readjustment of the language so as to weld together existing law without in any way changing the meaning or purpose of the law, I think we can revise and codify it; but I am quite sure if we are to consider, as in this case, the wisdom of the Congress of 1799, we will enter upon a hopeless task.

So I appeal to Senators if it is not best at this time to have an understanding that we will deal only with the use that is made of existing law in welding it into a convenient form under the provisions for codification and revision and will not attempt either to incorporate new legislation or to repeal existing legislation. Technically speaking, the change of a word in a statute is new legislation. But let us waive that technicality and deal only with the substance. Let us take existing law, using such apt words as are necessary to weld it together into concise and intelligent form, and content ourselves with that. Then we may hope to accomplish the purpose for which the Commission was created and for which your committee was appointed. I appeal to Senators if that is not the only possible hope of ever accomplishing the purpose upon which we have entered.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, one trouble about the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho is that the work of the committee does not consist merely of a revision for the purpose of improving the style and of abridging or making more concise the various provisions of law, blending together things which are widely separated in some instances. The very next two sections ahead of us I understand are new sections entirely, and if new sections are to be added, of course the door which opens the possibility of that admits also the entertainment of the question of subtraction.

Mr. HEYBURN. If we may deal with section 5, now under consideration, I promise the Senator from Georgia that when we reach those next sections, so far as I am concerned as chairman of the committee, there will be very little ground for controversy.

Mr. BACON. Of course I realize the extreme difficulty of the Senator's task. The question is not simply one of the consideration of the measure as we go through with it, but putting it in a shape where it will ultimately receive the vote of Senators. It seems to me that where there are grave objections to provisions of law, in order to gather the support of Senators it is very important that the objectionable features should be eliminated.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I realize that what the Senator from Georgia says is true, and it is a question to be considered at this time seriously and I hope finally, so far as the consideration of the pending bill is concerned. But I would inquire of the Senator from Georgia whether or not in his judgment, from an inspection of section 5, there is any new legislation in it.

Mr. BACON. I do not think there is anything material except the extension over additional territory.

Mr. HEYBURN. The change there is geographical.

Mr. BACON. Yes. My objection is as to the law as it stands.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is the Senator willing to waive his objection to the existing law for the purposes of considering this bill, because if Senators are not willing to accept existing law for the purposes of the consideration of the bill, I see before me nothing but a hopeless task, and I see behind me a lot of futile work extending over many months?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not know what to say to the Senator. If the Senate were present it would be a very easy matter. But I submit to the Senator now, where there is an issue beween the committee and any Member of the Senate as to whether a proposed change should be adopted, how does the Senator propose to have it settled? By a vote?

Mr. HEYBURN. I presume that every section will have to be determined by a vote where a vote is called for; but I also hope that a vote will only be called for where there is some real, live principle of law involved, that is either new or in the nature of new law, or a new application of existing law. The committee has tried to avoid reporting either new law or a new application of existing law. I think there are eleven new sections. In one sense they are new, but as a fact they are sections rendered necessary because of the rearrangement of existing law.

Should the Senate determine that we are wrong in the conclusion that these new sections are rendered necessary, of course we will be compelled to yield them, because it is not the purpose or the intention of the committee to insist upon new legislation in connection with the consideration of the bill. They realized from the very start the difficulty of the task, not only the difficulty involved in the intellectual process of evolving the law from an admixture of statutes, many of which were overlapping and inconsistent and one passed without the knowledge even of the existence of another, but the difficulty that must necessarily arise from determining the method of consideration. We are face to face with that now, and no more serious period has been reached in the process of revising and codifying the laws than that which now presents itself to us.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that it is his understanding that action is not necessary upon the section now under consideration; that the entire bill will be open to amendment as in Committee of the Whole until the bill is reported to the Senate; and that a section passed over is merely brought again to the attention of the Senate for consideration and amendment, if thought necessary, and no vote is required upon the section.

Mr. HEYBURN. I so understand, and I merely wanted the RECORD to show that when we pass over these sections they are passed over with the same purpose as the sections not included in this reprint.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Precisely. That is quite correct. The Secretary will read the next section passed over.

The Secretary read the next section passed over, as follows:

SEC. 33. Whoever, being an officer authorized to administer oaths or to take and certify acknowledgments, shall knowingly make any false acknowledgment, certificate, or statement concerning the appearance before him or the taking of an oath or affirmation by any person with respect to any proposal, contract, bond, undertaking, or other matter, submitted to, made with, or taken on behalf of, the United States, and concerning which an oath or affirmation is required by law or regulation, or with respect to the financial standing of any pricipal, surety, or other party to any such proposal, contract, bond, undertaking, or other instrument, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, this section is new legislation at the suggestion of the administrative branch of the Government. It was my opinion at the time that it was not within the province, or if it was within the power it was not appropriate for the committee to propose new legislation either upon their own initiative or at the instance of any person or branch of the Government. But the committee have reported this section. It is new, and it is with the Senate to say what they will do with it. An amendment was suggested to strike out the words "or regulation."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understood the objection which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] made to the section was that it made it a criminal offense to violate a regulation made by an administrative officer of the Government.

Mr. TELLER. What section is that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is section 33. It makes it a criminal offense to make a false certificate in a matter concerning which an oath or affirmation is required by law or regulation. I understood that the objection of the Senator from Colorado was to the word "regulation."

Mr. TELLER. That was the objection I had. I do not believe we can authorize any head of a Department to make a regulation the violation of which shall become a criminal offense, and I want to strike out the word "regulation."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, line 19, section 33, after the word "law," strike out the words "or regulation."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the section is to remain, I am not in favor of striking out the word "regulation."

Mr. TELLER. I do not intend that the bill shall pass with that word in it. I shall oppose it even if it defeats the whole bill. The Supreme Court of the United States have said that Congress can not authorize the head of a Department to so make a regulation the violation of which shall be a crime, and it ought to be apparent to every lawyer in this country that that can not be done. It is enough for the Department to enforce the law, and it is enough to punish men for a violation of the law and not for a violation of the will of some clerk or subordinate who may draft regulations.

Mr. President, I have some feeling about this matter. I propose that the word "regulaton" shall go out if I can get it out. If not, I want to say that I shall start in with a fight on the bill, and there will be a quorum here every time there is a vote taken.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLAURIN. I will state to the Senator that I do not understand it authorizes a Department to make a regulation that shall be law, but only that the false certificate of an officer to an affidavit that is required by law or an affidavit required by the regulation of a Department shall be a criminal offense.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not think it is worth while to discuss it. I have gone over it and I believe this will be one of the things which will be held to be an offense under the law. Nineteen of my constituents were recently indicted for violating the regulations made by the head of a Department under authority to make regulations to carry out the statute,

Instead of doing that the Department went to enacting laws by way of regulations. The court, of course, knocked it out; but I do not desire to give an opportunity for any more of that kind of business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not object to the entire section going out, if that is the desire of the Senate, but I have suggested that there is a distinction between the provision of the section and the provisions of law which the Supreme Court has held to be invalid. I think the distinction is a very clear one, and it has been recognized by the Supreme Court repeatedly.

Mr. TELLER. I have examined the question, and I am very confident we shall have the same trouble with this provision that we have had with some others. I think it had better go out. I do not agree with the Senator from Utah on this proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is to strike out the words "or regulation."

Mr. TELLER. "Or regulation." That is all I ask shall be stricken out.

Mr. KEAN. I thought the Senator from Colorado proposed to move to strike out the whole section.

Mr. TELLER. No; I only moved to strike out the words "or regulation."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I dislike very much to persist in this matter, but I do not think I ought to permit a vote to be taken without calling attention to one or two decisions of the Supreme Court upon this precise question. If the section is to be enacted at all, I think it ought to retain the language which the Senator from Colorado moves to strike out.

I call attention to the decision of the Supreme Court in 165 United States, which is a very recent decision, at page 533, where the court very clearly lays down the line of distinction between the case which we are now considering and a case where the violation of a regulation can not be made a criminal offense. At page 533 the court uses the following language:

> We agree that the courts of the United States, in determining what constitutes an offense against the United States, must resort to the statutes of the United States, enacted in pursuance of the Constitution. But here the law required the packages to be marked and branded, prohibited the sale of packages that were not, and perscribed the punishment for sales in violation of its provisions, while the regulations simply described the particular marks, stamps, and brands to be used. The criminal offense is fully and completely defined by the act, and the designation of the Commissioner of the particular marks and brands to be used was a mere matter of detail. The regulation was in execution of, or supplementary to, but not in conflict with, the law itself, and was specifically authorized thereby in effectuation of the legislation which created the offense. We think the act not open to the objection urged, and that it is disposed of by previous decisions. (United States v. Bailey, 9 Pet., 238; United States v. Eaton, 144 U. S., 677; Caha v. United States, 152 U. S., 211; In re Kollock, 565 U. S. Reports, p. 533.)

And again, on page 534, referring to the case in 152 United States, and quoting from that case, the court says:

> This is not a case in which the violation of a mere regulation of a Department is adjudged a crime. United States v. Bailey (9 Pet., 238) is in point. There was an act of Congress making false testimony in support of a claim against the United States perjury, and the defendant in that case was indicted for making a false affidavit before a justice of the peace of the Commonwealth of Kentucky in support of a claim against the United States. It was contended that the justice of the peace, an officer of the State, had no authority under the acts of Congress to administer oaths, and that, therefore, perjury could not be laid in respect to a false affidavit before such officer. It appeared, however, that the Secretary of the Treasury had established, as a regulation for the government of his Department and its officers in their action upon claims, that affidavits taken before any justice of the peace of any of the States should be received and considered in support of such claims. And upon this the conviction of perjury was sustained, Mr. Justice McLean alone dissenting. It was held that the Secretary had power to establish the regulation, and that the effect of it was to make the false affidavit before the justice of the peace perjury within the scope of the statute, and this notwithstanding the fact that such justice of the peace was not an officer of the United States. Much stronger is the case at bar, for the tribunal was composed of officers of the Government of the United States; it was created by the Land Department in pursuance of express authority from the acts of Congress. This perjury was not merely a wrong against that tribunal or a violation of its rules or requirements; the tribunal and the contest only furnished the opportunity and the occasion for the crime, which was a crime defined in and denounced by the statute.

So in this statute, providing that it shall be an offense for an officer to certify falsely in a matter concerning which an oath or affirmation is required by law or regulation, the provision for the regulation simply furnishes the occasion for the commission of the offense, but the offense is the violation of the statute—not the violation of the regulation. Let me repeat what the Supreme Court says:

> The tribunal——

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, I have read that opinion several times. The Senator need not read it for my benefit. He may read it if he wants to convince the Senate, but he need not read it on my account.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (reading):

> The tribunal and the contest only furnished the opportunity and the occasion for the crime, which was a crime defined in and denounced by the statute.

There is much more to the same effect, but I will content myself by reading simply the concluding clause. After referring to other cases, the Supreme Court says:

> This, it will be observed, is very different from the case at bar, where no violation is charged of any regulation made by the Department. All that can be said is that a place and an occasion and an opportunity were provided by the regulations of the Department, at which the defendant committed the crime of perjury in violation of section 5392. We have no doubt that false swearing in a land contest before the local land office in respect to a homestead entry is perjury within the scope of said section.

Mr. President, it is of no particular importance perhaps in this one section, but there are other sections—sections of existing law—which make exactly the same provision, and under which many cases have been prosecuted. So it is a matter which goes to a very large part of the bill. If it were not for that, I should not have said what I have said with reference to it. I do not think the word "regulation" ought to be stricken out of the section. If the section is to remain at all, I think it is essential that that part should remain in it.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator who has charge of the bill will agree to strike out the section, of course that will save any question about the word "regulation."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to move to strike out sections from this bill, even though I had reserved the right to express an independent or differing opinion when they were under discussion. I think that any motion to strike out a section should come from some Senator other than myself, representing, as I do, the will of the committee who reported this bill, and the sections so reported were reported pursuant to the wishes of the majority of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the sections of the bill heretofore passed over.

The Secretary read the next section passed over, as follows:

> SEC. 47. Whoever shall go upon any military reservation, Army post, fort, or arsenal, for any purpose prohibited by law or military regulation; or whoever shall reenter or be found within any such reservation, post, fort, or arsenal, after having been removed therefrom or ordered not to reenter by any officer or person in command or charge thereof, shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both.

The Secretary read the next section passed over, as follows:

> SEC. 49. [Whoever shall embezzle, steal, or purloin any money, property, record, voucher, or valuable thing whatever, of the moneys, goods, chattels, records, or property of the United States shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there is a change made in the existing law by that section, the policy of which I very gravely doubt. Under the law as it now stands, the perpetrator of either of the crimes mentioned in this section may be tried and punished in the district in which the crime is committed or in the district into which he may carry the property. The section proposes to eliminate the latter feature of the law and to make the perpetrator punishable only in the district where he originally perpetrated the crime.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, this is the section over which we had a great deal of discussion on a recent occasion.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. The States have widely differing laws in regard to this subject. It has been held competent for the legislatures in some States to enact a similar law and in others it has been held that they could not. I have asked for a list of the States having laws upon this subject, so that I anticipated when the section came up I would be prepared to give that information; but it has not yet come to me. However, it would be competent for Congress, in fixing the jurisdiction of the United States court for the trial of the class of offenses covered by this section, where the property follows the party taking it, or the party is found in possession of it in a jurisdiction different from that in which he took it, to give jurisdiction in both places; that is to say, that the party might be apprehended and tried where he was found with the property he had stolen or embezzled, or he might be taken back to the place where he committed the offense. That is a matter of policy.

The section as reported by the committee is in harmony with the majority of the decisions upon this question, and is in harmony with the best thought, if I may use that term, of our own Supreme Court of the United States, but the Supreme Court of the United States, of course, would be governed by the action of Congress in determining the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. BACON. I do not know that I care to interrupt the Senator right at this point, but I will call his attention to what I understood to be the contention of his colleague, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], when this matter was first before the Senate some days since. I understood the suggestion of the Senator from Utah to be that the principle under which one who has committed larceny could be punished in any jurisdiction into which he carried the stolen property could not apply to a case of embezzlement, and that therefore the law was incongruous. I think in that he was mistaken, although I myself may be in error, because, as I said the other day, I do not profess to be a criminal lawyer. While I have had some practice in that line, most of my practice has been on the civil side of the court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I made that statement—and I have no doubt I did if the Senator from Georgia says I did—it was an inadvertence. I think the Senator is correct, that the two offenses of embezzlement and larceny are affected in that respect by the same rule. I think that is correct.

Mr. BACON. Yes, because the only difference between embezzlement and larceny is that in the one case it is the felonious taking of the goods or property with which a party was intrusted, and in the other case where he was not so intrusted. If I recollect aright—and I think if the Senator will refer to the RECORD he will so find—that was the reason given why the change was made. In the absence of that, I know of no reason why there should be any change.

In response to the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] as to the decisions of the court, I do not think it depends in the administration of the criminal law upon the statute as to whether that principle should be invoked. If I am not mistaken in my recollection, it is a principle of common law that a party is liable to be indicted, tried, and punished in any jurisdiction into which the stolen article is carried. I may be mistaken about that, but I do not think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have no doubt at all that the Senator is correct in that, but were this confined to offenses that imply necessarily the possession of the property at the time of the arrest, then there would be no embezzlement. The Senator will see that this is a little broader than seems to have occurred to him.

SEC. 49. [Whoever shall embezzle, steal, or purloin any money, property, record, voucher, or valuable thing whatever, of the moneys, goods, chattels, records, or property of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.]

If a party had embezzled property, but had long since parted with it, and at the time he was arrested in a foreign jurisdiction—that is, in some other State—he would not have the property with him, then the offense for which he would be apprehended would in noway be connected with the possession or the recoupment or recovery of the property, but would be strictly an offense directed against the person for a violation of the law. It would have no element of property in it. All charges for larceny carry with them the element of property, because larceny can only be committed in connection with property. All embezzlements carry with them the element of property, provided that at the time of the apprehension of the party charged with embezzlement, he still has all or a part of the things embezzled; but where he has parted with it and the apprehension and trial of the party would not result in any way in the recovery of the property, then he is a naked criminal, to be tried with reference to his own moral obliquity.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am not seeking to amend the law. I am now siding with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] in his contention that the law as it now stands should be allowed to remain. I am simply contending that the law as it is now on the statute book is in better shape in its provisions than the one which it is proposed to substitute for it.

The proposed statute, as read by the Senator, down to the words "United States" is exactly the same as the law now, and the change is thereafter. Now, in order that that may be seen, I will read the entire section as the law now stands:

That any person who shall embezzle, steal, or purloin any money, property, record, voucher, or valuable thing whatever, of the moneys, goods, chattels, records, or property of the United States—shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof before the district or circuit court of the United States in the district wherein said offense may have been committed, or into which he shall carry or have in possession of said property so embezzled, stolen, or purloined, shall be punished therefor by imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary not exceeding five years or by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both, at the discretion of the court before which he shall be convicted.

I quite agree with the Senator that where the existing law is not radically objectionable, it should be maintained in its present form, unless it might possibly be in the matter of phraseology. But there is there a radical change denying to the court jurisdiction. I am of the opinion that if nothing was said in the original law on the subject of jurisdiction, and there was no particular jurisdiction specified here, the court would have jurisdiction in the district where the offense was originally committed, and also in every district into which the party might carry the stolen property, but with the law as it now stands on the book, to change it and limit the jurisdiction to the place where the offense was originally committed, would be construed by the court as an intention on the part of Congress to deny jurisdiction in any other district except the one specified district in which the offense was originally committed. Unless there is a good reason for doing so, why change it?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would call the Senator's attention to the language of the existing law as to whether it is not open to the element of uncertainty and ambiguity in that it provides:

That any person who shall embezzle, steal, or purloin any money, property, record, voucher, or valuable thing whatever, of the moneys, goods, chattels, records, or property of the United States, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof before the district or circuit court of the United States in the district wherein said offense may have been committed, or into which he shall carry or have in possession of said property so embezzled, stolen, or purloined, shall be punished therefor by imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary not exceeding five years or by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both, at the discretion of the court before which he shall be convicted.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, there is an ambiguity about that language that might lead to some embarrassment. There is the alternative element in the statement of the jurisdiction; there is the alternative element in the statement of the offense. Two offenses are stated, one the stealing or embezzlement and carrying the property into another jurisdiction, in which case either jurisdiction may try and punish, or the other of stealing or embezzlement and not carrying it into another jurisdiction. The question arises whether or not in that case the party can be punished where apprehended. I am of the opinion, from such attention as I have given to it, that he could only be punished in the place where he was apprehended, provided he had the goods or some part of them with him. If the Senator will give close attention to that language he will see that there is no other reason for stating it in the alternative, except for the use of the language "or into which he shall carry or have in possession said property so embezzled"—that is, the jurisdiction into which he shall carry it or have in possession the property.

Mr. BACON. It is possible for a party to embezzle or steal property in one jurisdiction and himself go to another jurisdiction and have some one else to bring it to him? That is one of the extreme cases, but that illustrates it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under this section he may be apprehended in any jurisdiction if he has the goods on him. He may be tried where apprehended, because the statute says if he shall take such goods or have them with him in that jurisdiction he may be tried there, but if he shall be arrested naked of the goods he must be taken back where he committed the offense.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think this is a matter of some importance, or I would not detain the Senate with a discussion of it. I can conceive of circumstances in which the Government might be unable to bring parties to justice if the law were changed, as is proposed by the committee.

There are a great many officials of the Government intrusted with public property who are constantly moving from one jurisdiction to another, and why should we put it in the power of a party who has committed an embezzlement to set up the question of jurisdiction, when it can be shown that in a certain jurisdiction he had the property in his possession? We may not be able to show where it was that he originally embezzled it, but why should there be any change when, in a matter of substance of that kind, justice may be defeated?

This is a matter of grave importance, Mr. President, in view of the fact of the wide extent of this country, the facilities for rapid intercommunication, and the large number of officers of the Government in various Departments who are intrusted with money and other valuable things, who are constantly passing from one end of this country to the other. When one has undoubtedly, and possibly beyond dispute, embezzled property, why should the court be put to the necessity of establishing the fact as to where he originally embezzled it, if he be found in possession of it? That is only one illustration, and there are a great many others which might be made.

It is true of the law now, Mr. President, as it was in the day of Blackstone, that the reason for the law frequently is not seen until the law itself is abandoned or repealed, when the reason which caused its original enactment is brought forcibly to the realization of parties by the failure of justice or by the accomplishment of injustice in consequence of the repeal of the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am far from disagreeing with the views expressed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I am here only to present the opinion of the majority of the committee as to the wisdom of this change. This is a larger committee than that consisting of ten members which passed upon this subject, and it seems to me that the suggestions made by the Senator have all of the weight and force that were given to the law as it was enacted by those who did enact it in 1875. I am not inclined to continue the discussion further than is necessary to a clear understanding of the difference between the existing and the proposed law, and then to submit it. I would suggest to the Senator that, in order to insert the words he proposes, certain other words would have to be changed in the section; and if the Senator desires to insist upon the change, we might pass this section until it can be redrafted.

Mr. BACON. I realize the fact that there are some verbal changes which could be made to advantage in the section in order to harmonize it with the language which has been adopted by the committee as to other sections. I think the suggestion of the Senator is a very good one, and I hope the section will be redrafted so as to retain that feature of the law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Georgia, before that matter is finally disposed of, one or two other matters for consideration in connection with this provision. While I think it is open to the objection that it is invalid as opposed to the provision of the Constitution which requires that an accused person shall be tried in the State and district where the offense is committed, there are also objections to the policy of such a provision.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in order that the Senator may complete the argument, right upon that particular point I want to suggest that I think in contemplation of the law it would not be a violation of the Constitution in that regard, because the construction of the law is that it is a fresh commission of the crime in every jurisdiction into which the stolen goods are carried.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. BACON. That is a well-recognized principle.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The theory of the common law and statute law, which announces the rule for which the Senator contends, as I understand, is that where a man carries stolen property into another State and has it in his possession, if he continues to retain possession of it with intent to deprive the owner of the property of it, that is a fresh larceny in that jurisdiction. That I understand to be the reason of the rule. But let me put a case to the Senator——

Mr. BACON. I do not think the Senator has stated it exactly correct, if I may be pardoned.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator says if the party carries the property into a new jurisdiction and retains the possession. It is not necessary that he should retain it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That he has possession of it.

Mr. BACON. When he carries it there he has perpetrated a crime. That is the asportation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not mean that he should retain possession of it all the time, but that he has had possession of it in that new jurisdiction. If he parts with it afterwards, he has not altered the fact that he has committed an offense, for the offense has already been committed.

But the case I wanted to put to the Senator is this: Suppose a person in the State of California steals an article of personal property under circumstances that would make it a case of larceny in California, that after he has possession of the property in California he learns that the property belongs to somebody in Nevada, and with intent, made manifest to the jury beyond any question whatever, of carrying that property into Nevada and delivering it to the owner, he does so carry it into the State of Nevada, and delivers it to the owner of the property, could it be said in that sort of a case that he had committed in Nevada the offense of larceny? It seems to me not, because the intent to steal the property would be wanting.

Now I call the attention of the Senator to the language of this statute:

> Shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof before the district or circuit court of the United States in the district wherein said offense may have been committed—

"Wherein said offense may have been committed"—meaning the offense of larceny or embezzlement and that the judge of the district shall have jurisdiction of such offenses committed in his district—> or into which he shall carry or have in possession of said property so embezzled, stolen, or purloined—

Clearly indicating that in the other district it is not contemplated that the offense shall have been committed at all; but only that the one charged with the offense shall have carried or have in his possession the goods. Otherwise, there would be no reason for making the distinction indicated by the language, "wherein said offense may have been committed, or into which he shall carry or have in possession," either where the offense is committed or where the goods are carried and the offense is not committed.

Mr. BACON. That manifestly means "or into which, after having purloined it, he shall carry it." Any court in the world would construe it in that way. It does not mean that it shall be a crime to carry what has not been stolen.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But it would not be necessary to prove in the other State into which he had carried the goods that the offense of larceny had been committed there. Either the district where the offense has been committed has jurisdiction, or the other district where it has not been committed, but into which the goods are carried and where he has them in his possession, has jurisdiction.

Mr. BACON. The carrying of the thing stolen itself constitutes the commission of the crime afresh.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the statute does not so contemplate, I submit to the Senator, because the statute considers two things, and says either in the district where the offense is committed or where, the offense not being committed, simply the goods are carried, or where he has them in his possession.

I should not feel very free to criticise this provision of the law if I did not find that the framers of it had inserted at the end an unmistakably unconstitutional provision, namely, the provision which states:

> And such receiver may be tried either before or after the conviction of the principal felon, but if the party has been convicted, then the judgment against him shall be conclusive evidence in the prosecution against such receiver, etc.

That is manifestly unconstitutional and has been so held by the Supreme Court of the United States in 174 U. S., page 47. The whole thing, to my mind, indicates that the section was drawn without any very clear comprehension of just what the framers of the law were driving at.

I was going to suggest one other thought to the Senator as to the policy of the law. In this kind of a case of course the defendant is entitled to a jury trial. That means a trial by a common-law jury, which means a jury of the vicinage. The courts of the United States have held that that principle of the common law applies. If that is so, then where the party is tried in some other State he can not be tried by a jury of the vicinage. In addition to that, we have a provision of the law—section 878 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows—and I call the Senator's attention to this:

> SEC. 878. Whenever any person indicted in a court of the United States makes affidavit, setting forth that there are witnesses whose evidence is material to his defense; that he can not safely go to trial without them; what he expects to prove by each of them; that they are within the district in which the court is held, or within 100 miles of the place of trial, and that he is not possessed of sufficient means, and is actually unable to pay the fees of such witnesses, the court in term, or any judge thereof in vacation, may order that such witnesses be subpœnaed, if found within the limits aforesaid, etc.

Then the witnesses may be subpœnaed at the expense of the Government. Suppose under this statute a man originally steals property in California and carries it to the State of New York. Under this law, if it be valid, he may be tried in the State of New York. Suppose he happens to be an indigent defendant and makes affidavit to that effect. All of the witnesses who know anything about the ownership of the property, who know anything about the circumstances of the original taking in California live in California, and under this law not a single witness can be produced, because the law requires that he shall show that the witnesses sought to be subpœnaed are within the district, or, if outside of the district, within 100 miles of the place where the trial is had.

Mr. KEAN. I will say to the Senator from Utah——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. KEAN. I will say to the Senator from Utah that an amendment has been offered to a bill pending before the Judiciary Committee to change that statute. I myself offered the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am speaking of existing law.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will conclude in a moment.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah declines to yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I simply want to suggest to the Senator that under the present law you can send to California for a witness by order of the court. What the Senator refers to is the right of the party to have a witness by subpœna, which is a very different thing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Ah, the right I am referring to is the right of an indigent defendant to have witnesses brought at the expense of the Government.

Mr. BACON. That is not limited to the district. Of course he can not have them brought at the expense of the Government by subpœna, but by an order of the court he can have a witness brought from the uttermost parts of the country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If he is prepared to pay the bill.

Mr. BACON. No, sir; at the expense of the Government by an attachment. I do not think there is any possible doubt on that question. It would be the grossest injustice if we had a law of that kind, under which a man could be put on trial and not be allowed the benefit of witnesses in his defense. The right to have a witness by subpœna and the right to have one by order of the court are two very different things.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me read to the Senator the section. I do not think I can be mistaken about it.

Mr. BACON. What section is the Senator reading?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Section 878 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 878. Whenever any person indicted in a court of the United States makes affidavit, setting forth that there are witnesses whose evidence is material to his defense; that he can not safely go to trial without them; what he expects to prove by each of them; that they are within the district in which the court is held, or within 100 miles of the place of trial, and that he is not possessed of sufficient means, and is actually unable to pay the fees of such witnesses, the court in term, or any judge thereof in vacation, may order that such witnesses be subpœnaed if found within the limits aforesaid. In such case the costs incurred by the process and the fees of the witnesses shall be paid in the same manner that similar costs and fees are paid in case of witnesses subpœnaed in behalf of the United States.

I understand under that provision of law, where the defendant is indigent, when he is unable to pay the costs, he can only procure an order of court to subpœna the witnesses provided they are found within the district or, if outside the district, within a hundred miles of the place where the trial is had. It seems to me that even if that were not so it is unjust to compel a defendant, who is able to pay the way of his witnesses, to bring witnesses from California to New York when all of the essential facts of the case have transpired in California, when everything that occurred in California must be proved upon the case in his defense. It seems to me that the operation of the law is unjust, and both for the reason that I believe it to be of doubtful validity, to say the least, and because I believe it to be unjust and oppressive in its operations, I think it ought to be stricken out of existing law.

Mr. BACON. I presume the question as to the hardship of the law is best illustrated by experience. I do not suppose the Senator can refer to any instance in which the law as it now stands upon the statute books has worked any of the hardships to which he has referred. They are imaginary so far as practical experience would demonstrate their existence.

Mr. KEAN. I ask the Senator from Idaho if he is willing now to have the pending bill laid aside.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 5, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

RESIDENT COMMISSIONERS OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House No. 190, have had the same under consideration, and in lieu thereof report the following:

"Resolved, That the privileges of the floor, with the right of debate, be extended to the two Resident Commissioners appointed by the Philippine assembly in accordance with the provisons of the act approved July 1, 1902."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is simply intended to admit to the privileges of the floor, with the right of debate, the Commisioners from the Philippine Islands. In the organic act creating a civil government in the Philippine Islands, passed the 1st of July, 1902, it was provided that the assembly on its first meeting and every two years thereafter should elect a Resident Commissioner, who should be entitled to official recognition by all Departments of the Government. The Senate has already passed a resolution substantially the same in terms as this one, and I can not see that there is any room for considerable debate.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DALZELL. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois for a question.

Mr. MANN. Under the resolution passed by the House for the allotment of rooms in the Office Building it was provided that when Resident Commissioners should be given seats on the floor they should be allowed rooms in the Office Building. I notice that the present resolution does not in terms give them seats, and I ask whether it is intended that the Resident Commissioners, having the privileges of the floor and the right of debate, shall have seats on the floor of the House?

Mr. DALZELL. I should think that followed necessarily. What is the practice with reference to the Commissioner of Porto Rico?

Mr. MANN. We covered the question in this way, not knowing what the House might do, by saying that when the Commissioners of the Philippine Islands were given seats on the floor in the House they should be entitled to the same privileges as Members as to office rooms.

Mr. DALZELL. There is no provision in the resolution admitting the Commissioner from Porto Rico, but under the practice he has been awarded a seat.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken with reference to that matter. I looked it up with the Clerk at the Speaker's desk, who was under the same impression that I was, and we found a provision giving to the Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico a seat in the House.

Mr. DALZELL. In terms?

Mr. MANN. Either in terms or by giving him the same right as Delegates in the House. I do not remember which; it was apart from the original provision.

Mr. DALZELL. I think this is broad enough to cover it.

Mr. MANN. That is the intention.

Mr. DALZELL. That is the intention. I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, for the information of this side of the House, I desire to say that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules. The intent is to merely extend a courtesy to the Commissioners from the Philippines which has been already extended to the Commissioner Resident from Porto Rico—the right to a seat on the floor and the right of debate. The only way in which the Philippine people can reach the American people in any authoritative way is by giving to their Commissioners here the right of speech, although, of course, they have not the right of vote. Among these oriental people, especially, an act of courtesy goes further even than a favor, and an act of discourtesy makes an impression more hurtful than actual injury. I merely make that statement to express the hope that the resolution may pass unanimously.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House No. 122, have had the same under consideration, and in lieu thereof report the following:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers in any inquiry within its jurisdiction."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, I would like to say that this permits the Committee on Investigation of Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture to administer oaths and enforce the attendance of witnesses in making investigations concerning the expenditures of that Department. It goes without saying that we on this side would like to see the same thing done with regard to all of the Departments of the Government, and we have no objection to a resolution to investigate any one of them at any one time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What happened to the investigation that committee made in the last Congress?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I really am sorry to confess that I do not know.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from New York that the testimony taken by the committee was very voluminous and was reported, together with a report upon it, to the last Congress, but the investigation, as I am informed by the chairman of the committee, is being carried on now and going into other branches of the service under the jurisdiction of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I saw a very thick volume of testimony, and my impression was that the investigation had disclosed some flagrant violations of law. I was anxious to ascertain what action, if any, had been taken as the result of the investigation.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from New York that I have not examined the testimony or the report, and I do not know what it contains, but I know that the testimony is very voluminous and the investigation is now going on.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 16268) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves all points of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that I will endeavor to call this bill up on the conclusion of the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, which is now before the House.

EXTENDING PAYMENTS ON HOMESTEAD ENTRIES IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10577), to extend the time of payments on certain homestead entries in Oklahoma, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time within which all payments required by the act entitled "An act to open to settlement 505,000 acres of land in Kiowa-Comanche and Apache Indian reservations in Oklahoma Territory," approved June 5, 1906, and the act entitled "An act giving preference right to actual settlers on pasture reserve No. 3 to purchase land leased to them for agricultural purposes in Comanche County, Okla.," approved June 28, 1906, be, and the same is hereby, postponed and extended for one year from the date on which such payments are now by law required to be made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to say, first, that in my judgment this bill was erroneously referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. I think it should have gone to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but it is here and favorably reported. If the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McGUIRE] is willing to accept an amendment which protects the right of the Indians, I am entirely willing the bill should now be acted upon, provided there may be an understanding that if this amendment is stricken out in the Senate when the bill comes to conference the Indian Committee may be represented on that conference. The amendment which I propose is this:

At the end of line 14, on page 1, add:

Provided, That as a condition precedent to such extension, in each case the settler shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, to be held in trust by him for the benefit of the Indians entitled thereto, 4 per cent on the amount of the deferred payments.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker. I accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the reason for this in the first place?

Mr. McGUIRE. The reason is this: This land, 520,000 acres, is known as the "pasture reserve" in Oklahoma, and was sold to the highest bidder by the Government. After the parties purchased the land they were required to make entry under the general homestead law. Entry was made. Those people were coming in from the different States in the Union, and they were given six months to make their entry. Many of them were late, practically all of them were late, too late to make a crop last season, and many of them are left penniless. They have made now the first payment, and unless this bill passes many of them will be left homeless.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will permit me to state there—is it not a fact the general condition of the banks in that country would make it certainly hard for these people to raise money at the present time?

Mr. McGUIRE. That is the fact.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And that it would cost something like $400,000, that being the second fifth, the second payment on the land?

Mr. McGUIRE. The depression which exists at this time in that country would make it very hard on them and many would lose their homes, possibly one-third of them.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact the reason given for this bill in the report was that the banks were not paying currency over their counters?

Mr. McGUIRE. I think perhaps that is one of the reasons.

Mr. MANN. Is not that the reason given in the report on this bill for its passage, that at the time the bill was introduced the banks were not paying currency over their counters?

Mr. McGUIRE. I do not understand that is the only reason, but that is one.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I may be permitted to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois, the better reason, however, is this: That these settlers obtained possession of their land at such a late period in the season that many of them were unable to obtain a crop last year and therefore have no resources from which to make these payments. The deferred payments of settlers is a proposition which has passed this House over and over again and I have not any objection at all to that extension, but what I am contending for is, if that extension be granted, it be granted upon terms which will protect the rights of the Indians, so that they shall receive interest on the deferred payments.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will remember the last time such a bill passed this House I gave notice in the House I should object to the bill unless some special reasons were given, because it follows that those people who have already obtained land are in better condition than people who have not obtained land. It gives preference to a man after obtaining something instead of giving everybody an equal opportunity before they have acquired the land.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Illinois this fact, however. In this case the settlers have obtained these lands after a competitive bid, and the price paid per acre is on an average of $10.54, an exceptionally good price.

Mr. MANN. And which competitive bid provided how the payment should be made?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. MANN. Now, the proposition is to give them a preference over those who competed with them and who were not successful and did not know what good, favorable terms might be asked from Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. It gives them a preference, if you please, which they did not anticipate asking for at the time and which it is contended would not have been asked for provided they had been located upon the land in time to have produced upon it during the last season an ordinary crop.

Mr. MANN. Is that the fault of the law that provided for the opening of the land or the fault of the Department, or what is it?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is contended it is largely the fault of the Department; that is what these people contended.

Mr. McGUIRE. That is the contention.

Mr. MANN. Then I think it ought to require very careful consideration from the Committee on Indian Affairs, which has jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, and that is why——

Mr. MANN. It can be easily sent to the Committee on Indian Affairs now, and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

And pending the putting of that motion I ask unanimous consent to modify the order heretofore made in reference to general debate, so that we will close general debate at the conclusion of to-day's session, and that on to-morrow the bill be taken up under the five-minute rule. Application has been made to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] and to me for additional time to the amount of better than four hours. I presume that other applications will be made during the day, probably, and it is more than likely that the entire day will be taken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] asks unanimous consent to modify the order of the House so that debate on the Indian appropriation bill may proceed to-day, and that in to-morrow's session the consideration of the bill shall be under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SUBPORT OF KNIGHTS KEY, FLA.

Pending the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], the Speaker laid before the House the following request from the Senate, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3344) extending to the subport of Knights Key, in the State of Florida, the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15219—the Indian appropriation bill—with Mr. PERKINS in the chair.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I neglected yesterday to ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I now make that request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] asks permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ascertain how much time has been used on the respective sides.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been three hours and thirty-six minutes used on the Republican side and two hours and fifty minutes on the Democratic side.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am willing that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] should occupy some of his time now.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield one hour to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address a few words to the committee this morning upon yesterday's debate, the commissions and omissions of the President's last message, and what I regard as the Democratic legislative programme in this House in as far as a minority without power to legislate may have or can be said to have a legislative programme.

I was glad, Mr. Chairman, to hear the debate of yesterday, and if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] can draw any more consolation from it than I can he will draw a great deal. It showed that there is life in the old party yet. The Democratic ship of state is being driven on by the sails of renewed hope and enthusiasm. All that is necessary is to keep her on an even keel. A sufficient guaranty of party success is that we confine ourselves to actual and practical issues and not attempt to wage the approaching campaign on any questions of a purely academic character. I was especially glad to hear one utterance that fell from the lips of the gentleman from Iowa himself. He said that this last message "in its every part met with the approval of the American people." With regard to that utterance I differ with him. I think there are some things in it which are centralizing, federalistic, and dangerous to the American Republic. But the gentleman from Iowa went on to say that "the principles of that message would be enacted into legislation," and that there "were those who were saying that this House would do nothing this session;" but that he served notice that it would do something, and that "whoever stood in the way" of the legislation proposed in that message would be "run over and badly disfigured in the struggle." Now, Mr. Chairman, this threat made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] against the "Big Four" who manage this House, consisting of the Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and of his colleague from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], the captains of the old guard of the "stand pat" army, delighted my heart. I hope the standard of rebellion raised by the gentleman from Iowa will not be ingloriously lowered by him, and I hope to see some of the things in this message, though not by any means all of them, legislated into law. [Applause on Democratic side.]

I am going to consider this message, not from the standpoint of a hero-worshipper, for I am none. I have never been a worshipper of men. Burns was right when he said:

"A mon's a mon for a' that."

But the converse of the proposition is also true.

A mon is nought but a mon for a' that.

I shall consider the positions taken upon the issues with which we are confronted, mentioned in the message, and shall consider them impersonally without any regard to the personality of the Honorable Theodore Roosevelt, from whom the message emanates. I shall consider them just as if they had constituted a message emanating in the past from Grover Cleveland or William McKinley, or a message, which it more nearly resembles in its substance, to emanate in the future from the Honorable William Jennings Bryan, of Nebraska. [Loud applause on Democratic side.]

Before I do that, however, a few words about the debate. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] denied that the rate law, or the central principle that it represented, was of Democratic origin or conception, and he inquired if the President had departed from Republican policy when he advocated it, and then he challenged anybody to go to the history of rate legislation and to deny the insinuated assertion that it was a policy of Republican origin.

Mr. Chairman, months before the Republican party nominated the present occupant of the White House as President, and before the Democratic party nominated Alton B. Parker of New York as its nominee in that contest, the leader of the Democratic minority on this floor, in the name of that minority, introduced and made an argument in behalf of a bill for rate legislation to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to set aside an unjust, unreasonable, or discriminatory rate, and to substitute in lieu of it a rate which should be just, reasonable, and not discriminatory. That was the first bill ever introduced in this House so far as I know for that purpose. It was succeeded about 30 days later by another bill, covering that and a very much broader field of railroad legislation, by a then Democratic Representative from the State of New York. When the first bill referred to was introduced it was thought wise to confine our efforts and to concentrate it upon the one central salient point of fixing rates. The temporary chairman of the Democratic National Convention in the succeeding summer spent about 15 minutes of his time in his address to that convention dwelling upon the importance of this very legislation, and arraigning the Republican Congress and Administration for not having taken it up in committee and passed it, although the bill was pending, and pledging the Democratic party to take it up if it succeeded in the ensuing election. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democratic platform reiterated the demand. The Republican platform, to quote the language of the gentleman from Ohio, General SHERWOOD, was on this question "as silent as the 'oysters in Oyster Bay.'"

It was not until after the President was inaugurated and sent his first message to Congress that a single voice had ever been heard from the Republican party in favor of giving the Interstate Commerce Commission this additional power of fixing a just, reasonable, and nondiscriminatory and not excessive rate. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.] When that message came, the very language of it was placed by me in deadly parallel in the Congressional Record with the language of the bill which had been introduced as the voice of this side of the House. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, there are those who say that they are afraid of a radical in the White House. I am not one of them. I am afraid of a man who is less progressive than my party, because by the veto power he can defeat its action, but I know the inertia of American political machinery so well that I know no man can well push legislation beyond the average sense of the party to which he belongs. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Consider this administration of Theodore Roosevelt. How many and what of the many things which are vaunted as "my policies," coming from the White House, have ever seen the full noonday of legislative enactment except where in addition to his own party—he going far beyond it—he struck into a Democratic pathway so that he obtained the full and unanimous vote of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, it is not written on the pages of history, but it is an open secret—in my opinion beyond all doubt and all controversy—that had we on this side been willing, when the President came out with his message favoring rate legislation, to "rebuke the President," as we were appealed to to rebuke him, simply because he was a Republican President, had we been willing, I say, we could have found enough Republican votes coming from New England and Pennsylvania and New York and New Jersey, and from California, added to our own to have laid his message in the shade forever. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. I simply wanted to ask——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman to ask me this question, and after yielding to him I will ask that nobody interrupt me for three-quarters of an hour afterwards, because I want to make a consecutive talk.

Mr. HEPBURN. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman, who had referred to language that was in the bill introduced by himself, if in his discussion of this subject in a former Congress he did not insist that that very legislation was inserted in the Republican act of 1887, but that was taken out of it by construction of the Supreme Court, and that that legislation was a Republican measure introduced in the Senate by Senator CULLOM? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not that very legislation, but legislation that for ten years' practice was considered to reach that end. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the voice was the voice of Jacob and the hand was the hand of Esau. [Laughter.] That bill referred to by the gentleman as the "Republican act of 1887" was the joint product of a Democratic House and a Republican Senate. The legislation as finally placed upon the statute book was a conference compromise between the two Houses. The Democratic House originated the attempt to meet and overcome the evil of railway abuses, the Republican Senate amended by substitute, and a conference report recommended the actual legislation. The precise language which gave rise to the practice of the Commission of fixing rates, until the courts held that that language conferred no such power, may have emanated from the Senate. But that language, under judicial construction, failed of its purpose, if that was its purpose.

If my memory serves me right, and unless my statement is historically inaccurate, that bill as it left the conference committee, after finally receiving the approbation of John H. Reagan, contained the language under which for ten years it was admitted in practice that the Commission had this power, though later on, about ten years afterwards, I believe, the courts construed that it did not have it.

Now that matter has been threshed over and over upon this floor——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, just one moment. I will ask the gentleman to find any bill introduced in this House by Mr. Reagan in which there is a sentence that in any event looked to an Interstate Commerce Commission. On the contrary, there is no provision in any bill introduced by him excepting those of requirements and denunciations, and the remanding of the complainant to the courts. He was a bitter opponent of the Commission, and he held the matter up during one Congressional interval after the bill was in conference before he would agree to that feature of the bill. I make that statement because I was a member of the committee, and I know that he was bitterly opposed to the Commission. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I may be inaccurate in my recollections. The gentleman from Iowa may be more accurate. He is an older Member, was here at the time and I was not; but I do know that the idea of meeting railroad abuses by Federal legislation emanated from the Democrats in a Democratic House, and I do know that whatever be strictly the history in detail of the case, when we took this matter up later on, in the Fifty-seventh and Fifty-eighth Congresses, after the courts had construed that practice out of existence, we could not get a report from the Republican Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in favor of that single, solitary principle of giving the Commission power to fix a new rate in lieu of an old one set aside, enunciated in a bill. I was afraid to put anything else except that single principle in a bill at that time, but I hoped that we might legislate that single theory, that single idea into law, and the Democrats on the committee and I hammered it as hard and as far as we could, but we could not get a report from that committee until a voice from the White House came, something like fourteen months afterwards, I believe, in a message recommending the legislation.

Now the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] finds much consolation in the fact that on yesterday one Democratic speaker, as he says, "denounced the President's message," and another "eulogized it" and "the Democrats applauded both." The truth is that one called attention to what he called some suppressions in the President's conduct with regard to labor matters, thereby rather impeaching the consistency and sincerity of his recently uttered views, and the other praised the recently uttered views. There is no great inconsistency in those two positions. But what I want to see is the great day that is coming when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] puts on the full panoply of his armor and stands out in front and says to the honorable Speaker of this House, to the two members of the Committee on Rules, and to the Republican floor leader, "You must enact this message into legislation, and if you do not, we are going to 'run over you,' and you are going to 'get badly disfigured in the struggle.'" [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now let us turn to a little of it. This message is not deserving of an all round eulogy upon the part of any man who loves democratic institutions, but there are many good things in it. In the first place I do not think this side of the House will indorse that part of the message which wants to take a step backward and restore to the railroads the power of pooling.

In the second place I can conceive of nothing more revolutionary and destructive of American institutions than the President's advocacy of the incorporation by the Federal authorities, and their absolute control, of all corporations doing an interstate commerce business. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In the third place I take it that nobody upon this side of the Chamber is of the President's opinion when he says that it is useless to attempt to punish the men—the flesh and blood beings—who violate the law in the name of corporate authority, and under the cover of corporate authority. The President uses this language:

> One of the favorite methods of this class of assailants is to attack the Administration for not procuring the imprisonment instead of the fine of offenders under these antitrust laws.

In the first place nobody has attacked him for not procuring imprisonment "instead of" fine. He has been attacked for not procuring imprisonment in addition to fine. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I say now that wherever the evidence is sufficient in a court to make a judge fine a corporation, as was the case in the Standard Oil case, or to secure an injunction, as was the case in the Northern Securities case, that that same evidence is sufficient for the prosecuting attorney to go before the grand jury and bring in an indictment. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The evidence which established the violation of law identified the men who used the corporate authority to violate it. Then the President, with one of his favorite methods—and his favorite method of arguing is to put everybody in the Ananias Club, or in some other sort of a bad smelling club that does not agree with him—goes on to attack everybody that belongs to the class contending that flesh and blood criminals should be punished. He says:

> The man making this assault is usually either a prominent lawyer or an editor who takes his policy from the financiers and his argument from their attorney.

Oh, what a woeful blow at that great reform governor of the State of New York, Governor Hughes! [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I do not belong to either of these classes I know, and I am of the opinion that you will never stop the violation of law by great corporations until you visit the punishment upon the sentient flesh and blood beings from whose brain and by whose act the violation takes place. The President further says:

> If the former, he has defended and advised many wealthy malefactors, and he knows that, thanks to the advice of lawyers like himself, a certain kind of modern corporation has been turned into an admirable instrument by which to render it well-nigh impossible to get at the head of the corporation, at the man who is really most guilty. When we—

When the President says "we" he means "I," i. e., himself—

When we are able to put the real wrongdoer in prison, this is what we strive to do; this is what we have actually done with some very wealthy criminals.

I have been cudgeling my memory to see if Rockefeller or Rogers or any of the people who entered into the combine in the case presented by the Standard Oil case or by the Northern Securities case, where they were adjudged by the Supreme Court to have effected a combine and to have violated the laws, are behind any of the prison bars. I do not find them there. But, let us take the first part of the utterance—"when we are able to put the real wrongdoer in prison," we put him there.

Is that historically accurate? Did Paul Morton go out of the Cabinet to prison after a confession of long-continued and conscious violation of these very laws? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

He went out of the Cabinet to a highly lucrative position in private life with a letter of commendation from the President of the United States. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The President in this very message furnishes documentary testimony of the violation of the very law to which he particularly calls attention, by certain parties. Is there any indictment of them, is there any promise to bring them to justice?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not like the President. I do not conceive it necessary personally to denounce men who differ with me in opinion. I am willing to accord to him all meed of sincerity and all honest purpose, just as I would demand of him that he accord the same meed to me, but I do contend that a corporation as such can not commit a crime. I contend that there never was a crime committed upon the surface of this earth that was not committed by some man or some woman—flesh and blood—possessing a conscience and a knowledge of good and evil, some sentient being morally responsible, and just as long as you attempt to punish the real evil doers by getting at the corporations alone in whose name they speak and whose authority they abuse, just that long is the punishment going to fall off of them as innocuous as water from a duck's back, while the violations of law go smoothly on. [Laughter.] There is not a case where these men agree to a rebate, there is not a case where they violate the trust law, there is not a case where they fail to comply with the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission to adjust safety appliances but that the crime can be traced back, if it can be proven at all, to the man by whose instrumentality the wrong took place. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Individual responsibility for wrongdoing and an equal opportunity for individual right doing is the underlying principle of all just and democratic as well as Democratic government. You can find the directors who vote for the wrong, you can find the officer who commanded it to be perpetrated, you can find the agent who perpetrated it. Right there an appeal is frequently made to a false and maudlin sentiment. It is said frequently that you must strike a subordinate; it is asked are you going to punish him? Here is a railroad agent, for example, who grants a rebate to the clerk or shipper, and you are appealed to not to punish him because he did it under the order of his superior, or under the rules and regulations as sent him "by the company." Those rules and regulations were voted by somebody (directors), distributed by somebody (officers).

The poor man who takes the order and executes it is a subordinate. "Punish him?" "Shame on you!" "He only obeyed his 'Boss.'" Such is the appeal.

None of that Oily Gammon sentiment appeals to me. I will tell you one of the most important lessons that you have got to teach the American people, if you are to save a government of law, especially to teach the agents of corporations, and that is that their "boss" in America is not an officer of a corporation, but is the law of the state and of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And when you punish one of them, you will not have to punish any more, because a man will not, after one punishment of himself or another, continue violating the laws of his country with a plea upon his lips that he did it "by the orders" of another man, himself not superior to the law. And that is not all. When he finds he must be punished or else somebody higher up, who is the principal criminal, must be punished, he will tell who the somebody higher up is.

Now, in so far as this message runs along lines parallel to Democratic policies, it is worthy of all praise. In so far as it does not, we have no words of praise for it. It is perfectly natural that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] should have praised a part of it, and in the beginning of his remarks he distinctly said that he praised only a part of it—the part announcing the determination to continue to wage war on predatory wealth and crime in high finance. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] misunderstood him, because later on the gentleman from Iowa said that he [Mr. COCKRAN] had praised the whole message. It was only natural that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] should call attention to certain discrepancies and inconsistencies between the President's present words and the President's past action. It was equally natural that the gentleman from New York should praise those of his present words which are brave and true and democratic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, in so far as lies in my ability, I am going give some idea of what, in my opinion, a Democratic programme of legislation would be, and I am going to invite the assistance of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], at the head of the Indians who are later on to get off the reservation on that side of the House, while we carry some of the elements of this programme out, those of them at least which are indorsed and subscribed to by the President and included in this message of which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] said all, "every bit of it," must be molded into legislation. Mr. Chairman, it is right hard to resist the temptation to go back to the discussions of the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses, where gentlemen on that side referred to what they called "the Democratic panic." I was glad to hear the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] yesterday say that panics came from natural causes, and that panics always would come as long as men were constituted as they now are, actuated by greed, over-speculative in times of prosperity, careless about debts, reckless about investments. I am not quoting his exact language, but if you had been here in the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses and had heard him and all of them on that side of the Chamber, you would realize what new doctrine this is from a Republican's lips. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] That is not all. They, the Republicans, went before the country and got all they wanted. They first stole Grover Cleveland's gold standard platform and enacted it partially into law, though not altogether, and then they said that with that behind them the country was comparatively safe. They then enacted the Dingley law, and then they said, "With this behind us the country is altogether safe."

Then they went ahead a little bit later and reformed the banking and currency laws. They increased the amount that the banks could contract the currency from three millions to nine millions, and we were assured we were on "a safe footing." Then they allowed the Secretary of the Treasury, subsequently approving it by a twist of a sentence in a Senate bill, to turn an "and" into an "or," and deposit other than United States bonds as security for money loaned without interest to favorite banks, those of them that were national depositories—extending the basis of security, receiving in lieu of United States bonds such securities as were included in the requirements of the savings bank laws of New York and Massachusetts and New Jersey, and, thus another special class being benefited by construction, they said, "We are safe now." They had already amended the banking laws by allowing banks with $25,000 to issue notes and then they had said, "Lo! we are safe again." Then prosperity continuing, because men were at work, prosperity having recurred after depression because prosperity always is bred by hard times and is the outgrowth of panics, and natural reaction, just as panic itself is the reaction from over prosperity or too long continued prosperity—prosperity continuing, they spoke all over the country about Republican prosperity and the divinely ordained partnership between the Republican party and God. There had been a Democratic panic, according to them, in 1893, although the legislation that preceded and accompanied the panic had been every bit of it Republican. But this they now say is not a Republican panic, although the legislation preceding the panic has been every bit of it Republican, and if legislation could have prevented it they alone had preventive power. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] My friends, you can not eat your cake and keep your cake also. If it be true that the Republican party has been responsible for the great prosperity that has been enjoyed for the last nine years, not only in the United States but all over the world—Canada and the Argentine being very much more prosperous than we, growing more rapidly in every respect by larger percentages—if that be true, if you have succeeded in finding enough fools in the United States to believe that—and you have—if you have carried every election upon it—and you have—what are you going to do with these same fools when they are faced with the converse of the proposition? You added to the number of fools nature had created by that false pretense and you have been buttressing their folly and disseminating it. How unteach what you have taught? You happened to be in power, there happened to be prosperity, ergo Republican prosperity.

You happen now to be in power, there happens to be a panic, ergo, Republican panic—I don't care whether you call it a Roosevelt panic or not; that does not concern me. The lie that panics never come with Republican Administrations is nailed, even for the poor fools who could read the history of the past record—nearly nailed over for those who can not read—nailed here and now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The present legislative conditions are Republican conditions. You made them and you are coming now confessedly to amend them in order to prevent the recurrence of panics just like the one we are now passing through. By the very fact of introducing the Aldrich bill and introducing the Fowler bill, and all of the various other schemes you are resorting to, to amend existing financial legislation, you confess that although you have been in full legislative control for a decade you have not done your duty; that you have fallen short of it. By the way, what sort of measures are you now offering a great country with all of its financial instrumentalities paralyzed from New York to San Francisco? What do you offer? On the Senate side the Aldrich bill. What is it? A railroad-bond-credit-strengthening bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is all. The railroads have already borrowed more money than they ought to have borrowed in justice to the shippers who must in the long run pay their debts, in justice to the stockholders who get but little benefit—the benefits mainly accruing to the ring within the ring, who manipulate and float and gamble in the stocks and bonds. They have already inflated too much the debts of the railroads. They had just about reached the point where they had to stop because the natural law was operating which prevents persons who have borrowed enough from borrowing more at less than ruinous rates. Men were beginning to doubt the goodness as investment of the bonds they were issuing. Then there sprang into the arena the great Senator from the State of Rhode Island, and, under the guise of introducing a banking bill, he wants to make railroad bonds a basis for a national note issue so as to increase the demand for railroad bonds, thereby increasing their price and the premium which they will have on the market, thereby decreasing interest charge on them, thereby increasing the ability of railroad magnates to issue more bonds, thereby increasing in turn the number of notes based on bonds, thereby increasing at still another turn the number of new bonds that can be issued; an endless chain of senseless inflation—note following bond and bond following note. For the purpose of strengthening the credit of the railroads you say? Oh, yes; in a certain sense, but in a more real sense of the officers and directors of the railroads who somehow or other manage to be possessors of the proceeds of bond manipulation. Then what proposed remedial measure do you meet with in this House?

A proposition for a banking law, "of bankers, for bankers, by a banker," fathered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER]. There is not a thing in that bill that seems to be drawn from the standpoint of the American people and those who are to be served by banks. It is all drawn with a view of enabling the banks to make more profit and with a view of saving the present investments of the banks. Just let me refer to one little thing in the bill as I go along. The bill is to enable the banks to deposit their portfolios as a basis for currency. One of the natural results will be a decrease in the demand for United States bonds and a fall in the premium at which those bonds are selling, but the favored class must not be neglected, although the new system will enable them to make much more profit out of banking than the present system. They must not even suffer a little loss in a fall in the price of the bonds consequent upon their recourse to a more profitable banking system, and therefore a skillfully inserted sentence is found to the effect that when a certain contingency is reached the money shall be invested by the Government in United States bonds—2 per cent bonds, the class that is held by the banks. Then comes this little skillful dodger to the effect that the Government in buying these bonds shall pay for them, where they are now in the Treasury deposited as a basis of note issue, the price which the owners paid for them, whatever that may be, or may be alleged by them to be, with none to gainsay. So that the bankers, and the bankers alone, are to be guaranteed against any fall in the price of bonds that results from the portfolio-asset banking, whereby the bankers are to gain profits immeasurably greater than any loss upon the bonds could offset.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we are in a time of profound peace, prosperity, and perfervid patriotic pride in our President and pervading panic—all together. Yours be the task to explain how political creators of prosperity become the noncreators of adversity. Let me tell you one thing and it will be well for legislators to take it to heart. No man in the world, whether in a schoolhouse, on farm, behind banker's counter, or in legislative halls can teach fools and the ignorant or unthinking a pernicious false doctrine without having it recur some time to plague the inventor. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Even-handed justice will always recommend the poisoned chalice to your own lips. You belong to a party which has taught the doctrine through protectionism and in every other way that a people's prosperity depends upon legislation, instead of teaching the doctrine that men's properity depends upon their industry and foresight and frugality and self-control, and upon the natural resources which they have and the freedom which political institutions leave them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The President's omissions in this message as in other messages are more significant than his commissions. He is talking all the time about predatory wealth and rich and powerful criminals, and how important it is to shackle cunning as in the past we have shackled force, and yet with the exception of a little insignificant utterance about putting works of art upon the free list, and wood pulp and paper upon the free list, he has never raised his voice in this or any other message against the very poison that lies at the heart of your entire system—marrying corrupt business to corrupt politics. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You talk to me about rotten business methods! You can not live in a country without rotten business methods if the central system of legislation in that country be an admission, an adherence, an advocacy even, of the theory that it is permissible for government to enter into partnership with individuals by legislation in order to make them prosperous at the expense of burdening everybody else. [Applause on Democratic side.] The minute you admit the rightfulness of so molding legislation as to enrich a man or a set of men, whether capitalists or laborers, by enhancing to others the price of what the favored classes produce above what it would be without legislation, that moment you have broken down the barrier that should separate politics from private enrichment, and that moment you have turned all the fiends of hell and corruption loose, because it is not a far cry from the man who would build up his own special business by burdening all of his countrymen through legislation, by tariff taxation, to the man who would build up by ship subsidy another class and by other legislation still other classes, and it is not a far cry from the man who stands in national legislative halls pleading for those so-called principles to the man who stands in a board of aldermen enriching his friends by contracts or by public utilities franchises. [Applause on Democratic side.] If it is allowable ever to enrich an individual by legislation, then there is no line of clear demarcation where you can say, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther." [Applause on Democratic side.]

Ah, the President comes now and reads us a good lesson upon some needed reforms. Not only does he leave out the central corrupt and corrupting and state socialistic influence of it all, but that is not all; he forgets to tell us why with regard to the things he does mention that he did not mention them in 1901 and 1902 and 1903 and 1904, and why he waits until he is just going out of the White House to leave a legacy of glory behind him in the shape of recommendations destined never to be carried into fulfillment by a Republican House and a Republican Senate. It is said he did not think of them sooner. How happens it that Democrats thought of them sooner?

My friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has been sitting here in the House with me for these many years. Democratic bills have been for years before the committees to do very many of these things recommended in this message. This is the first time that my good friend ever raised his voice in zealous and crusading zeal to carry out these reforms. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Under Republican legislative and administrative conditions we have got this country into this fix; I read a magazine article not long ago entitled "Morgan the Magnificent," in imitation of "Lorenzo the Magnificent," the chief of the family of Medici which made Florence so great; in which it was stated and I believe it is generally admitted—and many people regard it as a sort of eulogy of American citizenship—that Mr. Morgan put his hands upon the machinery and saved the country from a great, devastating industrial panic.

If you have a state of affairs where one man's hand upon the financial machinery of this country can save it from industrial destruction, you have a state of affairs where one man's hand can give it industrial destruction. [Applause.] Under whose legislation? Not ours. The banking laws are yours. The failures and omissions and shortcomings in the trust laws are yours. The omissions in the law are yours as well as the commissions in it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe in assuming a schoolmaster's tone and making of myself a scold. I do not believe that the Democratic party has a right to be a mere censor and a mere critic of legislation. It ought to be able to tell the country what it proposes to do, and that I propose to do now to the best of my feeble ability. The Democratic party is a constructive party, or, if it be not, it deserves to die. [Laughter on Republican side.] The history of the United States shows how greatly and superbly constructive and upbuilding it has been in the past. And to prove that it is yet a constructive party, whenever a Democrat is sufficiently prominent to get the ears of the people for a great reform, it is not long before the Republican party, forced to it by public sentiment and being in power, takes it up and says, "You proposed it, but we did it." [Applause on Democratic side.] Now, of course, to a certain extent a party in minority for forty-seven years less two can not have a legislative programme, because it can not legislate.

But it has things it wants to do. Now in the first place about this currency question; and when I speak this morning I speak not for myself alone, but I have the best reasons for believing that what I am going to say upon the currency question, the labor question, and in the main upon the tariff and trust questions—so far as it goes—meets with the approbation of the Democratic leadership at the other end of this Capitol and with the approbation of the Democratic leader in the country who is a member of neither House, but whose nomination for the Presidency by our party seems a foregone conclusion.

In the first place, this last panic was a depositors' panic. There were no men in line with bank notes seeking their collection; and yet every Republican remedy offered is bank-note legislation of some sort. Why was it a depositors' panic? It was because the depositors had lost confidence in the class of collateral that was being received by the banks as security for the loans that the banks were making of the depositors' money. [Applause on the Democratic side]. To some extent they had lost confidence in the character of this collateral because its rottenness had been exposed in investigations in the States; to some extent they had lost confidence in it because the President was attacking this security, and to some extent they had lost confidence in those securities because they came to the conclusion that so much of the stocks and bonds as proceeded from unlawful combinations and trusts that were being received as security for depositors' money would be attacked by the Government later on. It began to be believed among the people that instead of the antitrust laws and railroad laws being a dead letter on the statute books, they were going to be enforced, and men said to themselves: "If that be true, there is no telling how low these stocks and bonds may fall."

Now just that far the President had something to do with the panic. He had created in the public mind, whether properly or not, whether justifiedly or not, the idea that he was going to execute the laws against the trusts and combinations, and that created a distrust of their bonds and stocks. Rich malefactors no longer lived in fancied security. Other people no longer fancied their securities. But outside of that there had been immense overspeculation, which always follows a period of great prosperity. Away back of that, at the basis and beginning of it all, there had been a gradually ascending scale of prices for many years growing out of the unparalleled increase in the volume of the basic or self-redeeming money of the world. Gold was increasing every year, and the percentage of increase each year from the last year's increase was much of a surprise. So that prices kept ascending, and as prices ascended men made money, and as men made money they became extravagant in living, careless about debt and reckless in investment, until after a while overstimulated business caught up with the increase of money volume, stimulating it, and found in comparison with the supply of loanable funds decrease in loanable funds at a reasonable and profitable rate of interest, and liquidation had to set in. I do not believe in being partisanly unjust about anything. I think the President's action in "turning on the light" probably brought the crisis about earlier than it otherwise would have come. There may have been unnecessary blare of trumpets. But if a rotten condition of things necessitates a crisis which is to come, the earlier the better, for the longer you put it off the worse it will be. [Applause.] A prosperity founded on rottenness is a prosperity that you had better liquidate out of or legislate out of—one or the other—just as soon as you can. Get down to rock bottom and start toward healthy prosperity.

Then, my friends, if I have correctly outlined the causes, remote and immediate of the panic, and correctly diagnosed it as a depositors' panic, what strikes you at first blush as a remedy or rather as a preventive of recurrence or continuance of the condition is that the banks shall be made to protect their depositors. I do not mean that the Government should protect them. No. No government has the right to pay the debts or guarantee the debts of a private institution. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not only has no government the right to guarantee the deposits of the bank, but no government has the right to guarantee the note of a bank [Renewed applause on the Democratic side]; and the Aldrich bill does that, and the Fowler bill, though not in haec verba, does substantially the same thing.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, no. Now will the gentleman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked not to be interrupted for three-quarters of an hour. I have admitted that your bill does not expressly guarantee bank debts. It does in spirit. Now, the objection to these schemes, which they say are perfectly safe, is that as a matter of superabundance of caution they make the bank debts a Government debt. But you should make them safe enough to stand for themselves and by themselves.

Now, then, the difference between the Government guaranteeing the debts due from a private corporation to individuals and having the corporation guarantee its own debts to its own depositors or other creditors by an adquate insurance fund is as wide as the difference between one pole and another; so that, unless I am mistaken, and I hope I am not, the first thing that the Democrats will want to do to prevent a return of panic of this sort is to build up in the Treasury by a voluntary assessment upon the deposits in banks a redemption or insurance fund of about fifteen millions of dollars. It will require no great assessment. In my opinion, one-eighth of 1 per cent will do it, but certainly one-fifth of 1 per cent will do it. Let that tax continue until the fund reaches the size of fifteen millions of dollars, and let it automatically, under a prescribed law, cease to operate when that amount is reached, and then, when it becomes necessary by depletion of the fund, let it equally automatically begin to build it up again until it again reaches that amount. It is not legally a tax upon the deposits in the bank, because it is voluntary and is paid only by deposits in such banks as voluntarily submit to the assessment in order that their depositors may be beneficiaries of the protective fund. The advantages to a bank's business as a receiver of deposits would be so great that none would stay out.

It would be merely a bank regulation; the Government a mere trustee of a mutual-protection fund obtained under regulations prescribed by law.

I would not make it a forced tax, but a voluntary assessment; because if you attempt to make it a forced tax there is a doubt as to whether you could constitutionally make it apply to State banking institutions. If you did not, then the advantage, as depositaries, of national banks would be so great as to drive State banks out of existence, and I do not want to drive State banks out of existence. In my section of the country they enjoy a larger measure of public confidence than the national banks, and they do a great deal more business. If voluntary, then State banks can come in, pay the assessment and share the benefit. But let the tax apply only to such banks as are willing to come in and be taxed, and then they will have the right to put upon their bank notes, and a right to put upon the window glass of their places of business the legend, "This bank is a member of the association of banks protected by the $15,000,000 mutual-insurance fund to depositors, lying in the United States Treasury." Then the State banks can join, on condition that they comply with the law, by paying the tax and submitting themselves to inspection. Now understand me. Let us get this right; not that they submit themselves to the penalties of the national banking law upon unfavorable examiner's report, but that the moment the national examiner gives an unfavorable report in connection with a State banking institution, that moment that State bank ceases for the future to pay into, or subsequent owners of deposits to enjoy any protection from this fund, unless and until it puts its affairs in proper shape. That is one way to increase confidence with the depositors. I am giving the plan rudely and rapidly. It will be reduced to writing in a bill later on.

One of the things that did more than any other to disseminate the panicky feeling throughout this entire country was the fact that under the present national banking law a country bank is permitted to keep three-fifths of its reserve in a reserve city bank and the reserve city bank is permitted to keep one-half of its reserve in a central reserve city bank. Out of this there grew the abominable abuse of not only keeping the reserve money at home to be available at any minute but of actually loaning it at interest to the banks in the reserve and in the central reserve cities.

So a Democrat, attempting to restore confidence amongst depositors, attempting to create a psychological condition with the public that would prevent unreasonable panics (you can not prevent all panics any more than you can prevent a fever from following a chill) would next I think provide that all of the reserves required by law—the reserves which in the opinion of the law are requisite and necessary to protect the credit of the bank—should be kept in the vaults of the bank. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now to that the objection is made that it would keep in normal and natural times too much money out of circulation. That can be avoided in the easiest possible manner. The law can prescribe certain interconvertible bonds to consist of United States bonds and of State bonds. I am not certain that the law ought to go any further than that. I know it ought not to go to railroad bonds or the bonds of any private corporation. [Applause on the Democratic side]. It might possibly go to municipal bonds of certain descriptions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman such time as he may desire to conclude his remarks. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how sufficiently to express my thanks.

Now, let the law designate these funds as "interconvertible bonds." Let the banks keep 50 per cent of their reserve in these interconvertible bonds, and let the law provide that when an emergency has arisen or is about to arise, any bank may deposit those bonds, previously inspected and prescribed by law, in the nearest subtreasury and shall receive for them what I would call "United States emergency Treasury notes." Thus in normal times the bonds would be in the reserve, constituting 50 per cent of the reserve, and the money they represented would be out doing its work. When a run started upon a bank, or when for any reason a prudent banker thought it wise to have his whole reserve fund immediately available, the entire 50 per cent of the entire banking reserves of this country kept normally in bonds could be at once reconverted into money, and that money used to meet the runs upon the banks, or whatsoever business emergency must be faced. The conversion could be effected by telegram from the nearest subtreasury to Washington, and an answering telegram to let the bank have so much money.

What 50 per cent of the entire banking reserve of the country at the present time is I confess I do not remember, although I hunted it up but afterwards forgot it. But it is very much more than the amount anybody has stated would have been sufficient in the way of emergency currency to have tided over the present difficulty.

What shall be the character of the note? Shall it be a bank note? No. Why not? First, for the physical reason—the difficulty of getting it out in time; secondly, for a psychological reason—the minute that it came with a different appearance from other paper it would scare the people to death and expedite and emphasize the panic without a Government guaranty; third, the Government could not consistently with sound principle guarantee a bank note. Without it, it would not meet complete confidence. It ought to be a United States note. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is no man further removed than I am from fiat money; but the note here described would have behind it the "intercontrovertible bonds" deposited in the subtreasury to meet the note; it would therefore be not a fiat but a secured and protected note, and the only difference between it and the ordinary greenback would be this legend on the face of the United States emergency currency note:

This note is secured by intercontrovertible bonds deposited in the Treasury of the United States.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Upon what terms would the note go out? Ought it to go out so as to form an addition to the ordinary normal circulating medium of the country? No. We have money enough. The volume is not the trouble; the trouble is to prevent the panic, to prevent the scare that makes people take money out of circulation and hoard it up, and therefore this money ought to go out under a tax, and a tax sufficient to drive it back after its work had been done.

Now, then, what about the character of the tax? Ought it to be a fixed tax? No; because the rate of interest that would carry money back at one time or in one section would not be the rate of interest that would carry it back at another time or in another section. It ought to be a flexible rate of taxation.

The tax ought to be a flexible tax, and I think that idea will be adopted on this side of the Chamber at any rate. The idea which I think is a good one is this: That the tax ought to be at the rate of one-eighth of 1 per cent per month for the first four months that the bank had it out; one-half of 1 per cent per month for the next four months or any fraction thereof, and 1 per centum per month thereafter. Thus it would gradually mount to a 12 per cent per annum tax, which would bring the money back even from the wildest and most speculative market in the country and away out from the Southwest, where the highest degree of prosperity exists.

An emergency currency ought to be an emergency currency; it ought to be carefully prevented from being anything else. You do not want to change the normal and natural currency so much as to provide something in a time of strain and stress to do the work, and afterwards come back in time of redundancy. Why do you want it to come back? Because, if it does not come back, then when the same contingency arises again you will have to have another addition to the normal currency, and by and by you have inflation piled on saturation, and that means overstimulation of production and enterprise, always followed sooner or later by exactly a commensurate swing of the pendulum in the other direction.

Now, what next would a Democrat recommend? He would recommend in the first place that this Government cease its present iniquitous system of lending money to national banks without interest. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That this results notoriously in personal, geographical, and political favoritism, "you all do know."

It will be remembered that when a banking bill was presented here during the last Congress I succeeded in securing an amendment to it for a rate of interest to be fixed by competitive bids in the market, and that that bank bill, amended to that extent by the vote of this side of the House and by the votes of enough of that side of the House to succeed in carrying the amendment, was never heard of any more. The national banks were anxious to reform the national bank laws, but not at the expense of themselves—not by doing what they require everybody else to do, to wit, paying interest upon loan.

Now, what ought to be the character of that interest? That interest ought, in my opinion, to be a flexible interest. Just as the rate of taxation upon emergency currency ought to be flexible, so the rate of interest upon these deposits ought to be flexible. I at one time was possessed of the idea that a competitive rate was the best way. I frankly confess that I do not now think so without a restriction of the limitations within which the competition shall play. My idea now is that the law prescribe a maximum and minimum rate, say, 2 per cent and 10 per cent, and leave the Secretary of the Treasury, within those limits and subject to competitive bid, free to deposit the Government surplus moneys, with this condition, that thirty days before the first of each quarter he should give notice of deposits to be made, and in that way our Government rate could take to a certain extent the place of the Bank of England discount rate in England, the Bank of France discount rate there, and the Reichs-bank rate in Germany, and in that way maybe to some extent influence international exchanges, and through that means only influence the flow of gold.

You are in this fix, gentlemen, and it is your fault, Republicans, that you are there. You have tried to stop in the middle, between two things, and you never can stop in the middle between two things of this sort. You must in the long run be logical, or else in the long run logic will punish you. You have a so-called gold standard without a gold circulation, and the consequence is that you throw upon the Government, at present without a dollar of expense to anybody who wants to avail himself of the service of the gold, the burden of maintaining your gold standard by furnishing always the actual gold. The banks do not even keep any part of their reserves in gold. They get all the profit out of the gold standard and make the Government bear all the burden of finding the gold. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Whenever gold export ought to be made it is the Government that must furnish the gold free instead of profiting by it—that must go out and pay for it, if they have been improvident enough not already to have provided themselves with it. Other means of making the rate of interest flexible have been suggested which would be better than nothing and better than a fixed rate. One suggestion is that for the latter half of the year the rate be a low rate, at crop-moving time, and that at the first half of the year the rate be a high rate, so as to drive the deposits back into the National Treasury and out of the depositories, to be available for another harvesting. Another is a scheme similar to that of the tax upon emergency currency, to wit, a flexible rate of interest gradually rising with the length of time that the bank keeps the money, with some provisions doing away with the present ability of the Secretary of the Treasury to select whatever bank he pleases.

Now, I do not want to talk pessimism and I am not a muck raker, but there is not a single one of you on that side who does not know I tell the truth when I say—and I am not confining myself to Republican Secretaries of the Treasury either, for I suppose it was true under Democratic Secretaries—that the power left in the Secretary of the Treasury without any condition of any sort to select the bank that he shall make a depositary has been used for political purposes, and has probably been used in some cases by some Secretaries for the purpose of "making friends of the mammon of unrighteousness," like the unjust steward while in with his master, so that when his master discharged him he could find an easy place of making a living. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] But let me go on. We Democrats would oppose the deposit of bonds of any sort of a private corporation as a basis either of note issue or of security for deposit in banks. [Democratic applause.] Another thing I think we ought to have, and the gentlemen with whom I have consulted think we ought to have; to wit: some sort of proportion fixed between the amounts of loans that the bank can make and the amount of its capitalization plus its unimpaired surplus. Here is, for example, a bank, let us say with $100,000 of capital and $100,000 of surplus, and say two millions of dollars of deposits, and that bank will lend out that two million dollars of deposits, all except 15 per cent, which is its reserve. Yea! it lends out all of it except two-fifths of 15 per cent, because it lends out three-fifths of the 15 per cent itself to a bank in a central reserve city. Of course, a deposit is an asset, but it is equally a liability. There ought to be some proportion between real assets and loans made.

Now, the case I have illustrated is unsafe. There ought to be some sort of proportion fixed. The State of Oklahoma has fixed eight times the paid-up capital stock plus the surplus. That is perhaps too much. The new State of Oklahoma is engaged in some rather dangerous experiments in order to invite capital, and perhaps eight times is too much, but say you fix the multiple at five or six, or whatever in the judgment of the committee it ought to be. At present the average amount is five and a half times, I think. What is it, Mr. Fowler?

Mr. FOWLER. I can not tell you offhand. You mean through all the commercial banks?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a poor head for carrying figures, but my recollection is the average loans of the entire national and State banks of the United States are five and a half times the capital plus the surplus. If I am mistaken in that I would like to be corrected, but whatever the figure is there ought to be a legal proportion fixed. One other thing; there is at present upon the statute books a law forbidding the national banks to loan over 10 per cent to anyone——

Mr. FOWLER. We changed that law last year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is it now? It is 10 per cent of the capital plus the surplus?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I meant to say. I had just got to the words "ten per cent" and had not gone any further when you stopped me. Now there is no penalty behind that law. The law has no sense. It is a mere brutum fulmen. It is a mere set of words upon the statute books and the law is constantly violated. Now, then, we think that there ought to be a penalty fixed wherever a man as a director votes to lend to one person, natural or artificial, over 10 per cent, or where an officer of a bank actually lends over 10 per cent. These loans undergo the scrutiny of the president of the bank and the directors—they violate these laws—and there I recur to what I have said several times, it is the flesh-and-blood man, who violates the law in the name of the corporation under the pretense of corporate authority, who ought to be punished. Now, the corporation ought to be punished by a fine equal to at least the amount of money in excess of 10 per cent the corporation had loaned, and the director who voted for it or the president who O. K.'ed it ought to be punished by a fine and imprisonment, or both. Now, with a safe relationship between the paid-in capital plus unimpaired surplus on one hand and the amount of loans upon the other, with a penalty behind the present very wise provision that banks should not lend to one person any more than 10 per cent, we think you would increase the degree of confidence in the minds of depositors very much indeed, and in just that far prevent recurrence of cause less or unreasonable depositors' panics.

Now I am going to take up another part of the Democratic programme. In the next place, the Democratic party is going to insist, and here I call upon the gentleman from Iowa, because the idea is in one of the President's messages, and he says:

All of his message shall be enacted into law;

The Democratic party is going to insist upon a law which will give publicity to the names and post-offices of the men who furnish money for campaign purposes. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I hope the gentleman from Iowa will lead his cohorts to the overturning of the "Big Four" upon that proposition.

Now, when we come to the labor programme the Democratic party is going to insist that except where danger to property or to life and limb is immediately threatened an injunction shall not be sued out without at least five days' notice and an opportunity for the other side to be heard. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Do not misunderstand me. In a case where riot is threatened, where life, limb and property are immediately threatened (not so-called judicially construed "property rights," but property), the man who is enjoined ought to have at least five days' notice of the hearing and an opportunity to be heard before the injunction is issuable.

Another thing: This does not come from the White House but it comes from the White House legatee, and as it is old Democratic doctrine we are going to insist upon it; where a judge has to pass upon whether a man has committed contempt outside of the view of the court, a constructive contempt, in order to avoid the partiality of trial which comes from the same judge acting as judge of the offense who issued the order violated, or whose pride of opinion is at stake in the matter, we contend that the man tried shall have the right to call for another judge, somebody who shall be impartial, somebody whose pride of opinion and whose vanity of position shall not be concerned in the decision of the issue. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Taft has come to that position finally, thank the Almighty Molder, Renovator, and Revolutionizer of human hearts!

Another thing; in cases of constructive contempt, technical contempt, away back in the Fifty-fourth Congress David Bennett Hill offered in the United States Senate, and the Democratic Senate passed, a bill, which was buried in a Republican House, that the man standing in constructive contempt, before he should be deprived of his liberty or of his property by fine, should have the right to be tried before a jury of his peers. [Applause on Democratic side.] How far that may have received Republican Presidential approbation I do not recall. The legatee seems in a recent speech to approve of it, too. Give it to us.

The Democratic party is going to insist upon election of Senators by the people. Already in Mississippi and many States we virtually have it. We have it so far as party nominees are concerned, but it would be better to have it so far as the struggle between nominees later on is concerned.

The Democratic party welcomed the Washington Post interview from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] this morning, to the effect that the Government had better "try it over again" on the income tax, to see if some change of opinion amongst the judges upon the present Supreme Bench can not give us a favorable decision upon that question. Some years ago, by a majority of one, and one of those suddenly changed, that court set aside the decisions of a hundred years and declared an income tax a direct tax, and therefore unconstitutional. The subsequent change in personnel of judges may result in a state of opinion by the judges, which may result in a sound opinion of the court, i. e., an opinion favorable to the constitutionality of the tax. But if we can not get that, we want a joint resolution passed, which we have introduced every session since I have been a floor leader upon this side of the House, to submit to the people a constitutional amendment declaring that nothing in the Constitution shall be so construed as to render an income tax a direct tax and in contravention of it.

One other thing to which I did not call attention in connection with the banking and currency question—and I think this side is thoroughly agreed upon it—is that bank examiners, in order to secure safe and cautious and thoroughly complete examinations, ought to be paid salaries and not fees for examinations. When paid a fee for each examination the ordinary man, of course, has a temptation to make very many examinations so as to make very many dollars.

Now, some resolutions and bills touching the great central fundamental difference between the two parties—the tariff; I hope that this Democratic resolution, No. 4, will pass, providing a thorough investigation of the paper trust, so that we can find out which one of us was right and which one was wrong here the other day, when the gentleman from Nebraska and I on one side and the gentleman from California on the other had our disputation.

I hope that the bill (H. R. 97) against overcapitalization of combinations, may pass; and, by the way, the President in one of his numerous messages—I have forgotten whether it was the last or not—is an adherent to that idea.

I hope that H. R. 100, which is taken from the Massachusetts statutes, and which is precisely in line with a part of the President's last recommendation, and which was introduced on December 2, 1907, and in the Congress before this as well, may pass. That provides a penalty against any person engaged in interstate commerce who shall in a sale to anybody else make it a condition of the sale that the party sold to shall not buy from anybody else except him or shall not sell to anybody else except him.

I hope that H. R. 106 will pass. Those gentlemen who are anxious about a merchant marine I hope will go this far at any rate. It admits free of duty under a statute that means it, and not under the present statute, which does not operate to that effect, all materials used in the construction of ships.

I hope also that H. R. 9149 will meet with the approbation of those gentlemen who are going to rise in rebellion against the "Big Four." That bill provides that anybody can purchase anywhere a ship, provided it is bought for use and is used exclusively in the trade between the mainland of the United States and the Philippines, or between the mainland and Hawaii, or between the mainland and Porto Rico. Every year you are forced to extend the period at which the navigation laws, the coastwise laws, shall take effect with regard to the Philippines and Hawaii. You are complaining now that there is no American marine to carry American freights to the Philippines. Let anybody buy a ship where he pleases. Do not break up your present monopoly of continental coastwise trade. I do not ask that much from you—I know you too well; but let the ships to be used in the trade between the United States and Hawaii and the Philippines and between the United States and Porto Rico be "free ships," bought anywhere and entitled to American registry.

I hope that gentlemen will pass resolution No. 5, asking a reconvening of the Joint High Commission for the consideration of reciprocal trade relations between the United States and Canada. The Democratic party wants that.

I hope that a bill may be passed which will enact into law the reciprocity treaty between the United States and France which was negotiated by William McKinley, and the confirmation of which was recommended to the Senate by him and which was defeated in the Senate in the interest of knit goods and class profit. A complaint was made that if passed as a treaty that it amounted to taking away from this House the power to originate revenue bills. So I have introduced a bill in the exact language of the treaty itself, that this House should pass, admitting certain French products at certain rates whenever the French Government shall have previously passed an act to admit certain products of ours at certain other rates, the products and the rates named in the bill being those named in the treaty.

I hope that gentlemen will agree and pass a minimum tariff law so that we may have a basis of trade and barter with all nations of the earth. I have introduced a bill for that purpose. If mine does not suit you, give us another. I took a 20 per cent reduction of present rates as a minimum because that was the percentage margin for reciprocity named in the Dingley bill. We stand alone, helpless among all the nations, without the ability to concede a thing in order to get a concession for the products of our farmers and our manufacturers exported abroad.

I hope that the bill H. R. 105 will be passed, because I hope that the Republican party, having been once betrayed into virtue by passing a law removing the duty on coal for two years, will be betrayed still further by making the removal of the duty on coal permanent; and that kind of a bill has been introduced in the last two sessions.

Above all things, I hope this bill (H. R. 112) will pass, which provides that wherever the existing duty is over 100 per cent it may be reduced to 100 per cent.

Now, the President and the President's legatee both say that the entire protective tariff in so far as it is just and right rests upon the principle that there ought to be a tariff tax equal to the difference between the foreign cost of labor and the American cost of labor. Well, certainly the difference between the two costs of labor never exceeds the entire cost of labor of the product; and certainly the entire cost of labor which goes as a factor into the price is never greater than the entire cost of the product. So let us have that bill passed. When presented by me for a vote in the Ways and Means Committee of the last House after amending it so as to exclude from its provisions tobacco and spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors which pay a large internal-revenue tax and are therefore subjected to a compensatory import duty, it was voted down by a solid Republican vote. "While the lamp holds out to burn the vilest sinner may return."

I hope New England gentlemen may succeed in persuading their brethren on the Republican side to pass the bills H. R. 113 and 108, one or the other of them. One is for free hides upon a reduction of 50 per cent of duty on products made out of hides. Everybody in Texas would get more benefit from the reduction of the price in saddles and other things than they would lose of profit under the present protection on hides. The other is to reduce hides to 5 per cent and reduce the leather schedule pari passu. I give you your choice. I hope that one of the several bills pending before the Committee on Ways and Means to put crude petroleum and its products on the free list and barbed wire for fencing on the free list may pass this House. I hope the duty on agricultural implements may be at least cut half in two.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] during the last session of Congress demonstrated the wisdom of passing the bill H. R. 114, which is to reduce the duty on watches imported into the United States to 15 per cent.

I hope to God that the Republican party this session will not be deaf to the cries of the little children of the land and fail to pass H. R. 115, which puts antitoxine or diphtheria serum upon the free list.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the price of that now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have forgotten the precise figure. It is all in the RECORD there; I put it in last year. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I know that, gentlemen, and know you do not know. The gentleman put it in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have myself forgotten what it was, but I consulted with one gentleman on that side, himself a physician, who told me, and I put that price in the RECORD.

I hope that the bill H. R. 9150 will pass. To those of you who love the memory of James G. Blaine I will state that it is but an embodiment, a rewriting, of the proposition of James G. Blaine which was turned down, as I understand it, by the Committee on Ways and Means at the time it was offered. I shall put this in the RECORD in full, that you gentlemen may understand it. It is—to declare the ports of the United States free to all products of any nation of the American hemisphere upon which no export duties are imposed whenever and so long as such nation shall admit to its ports free of all national, provincial, municipal, and other taxes our flour, corn meal, and other breadstuffs, preserved meats, fish, vegetables, fruits, cotton and cotton goods, cotton-seed oil, sugar, rice, and other provisions, including all articles of food, lumber, furniture, and other articles of wood, agricultural implements and machinery, mining and mechanical machinery, structural steel and iron, steel rails, locomotives, railway cars and supplies, street cars, refined petroleum, coal, and electrical apparatus.

This bill would admit these various things produced by our farmers free to South and Central American markets. We ought to admit their products therein designated free to our ports if we could get this immense concession. I especially call the attention of gentlemen from Kansas, gentlemen from Nebraska and from Iowa, Wisconsin, and Michigan to the provisions of this bill, and to the fact that the real father of it does not "come out of Nazareth," as I do, but was James G. Blaine himself.

I hope that a recommendation (I believe made by the President, though I am not certain; at any rate in line with the spirit of a recommendation of his) contained in H. R. 7656 will pass. That requires a railroad that wants to raise a rate, either eo nomine or by putting an article into a different classification, to submit the proposition to the Interstate Commerce Commission and give notice of it a certain time in advance, for the contention of shippers, before the raise can take effect.

I have introduced a resolution for the independence and neutralization of the Philippine Islands, as being in accord with all time-honored policies of the Democratic party. It is indorsed by the Anti-imperialist League, it is indorsed by William Jennings Bryan, and will, at some time in the future, be signed by him, I hope. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The present President's legatee has been for a long time in favor of free trade with the Philippine Islands. The Democracy has introduced here, at every term of Congress, a bill for that purpose. I express the hope that it may pass.

Now, gentlemen, at the risk of boring you I have run through these bills, because I do not like to stand here or anywhere else as the mere mouthpiece of a heterogenous collection of all elements of opposition, of censure, and of criticism. I believe a public scold is the least useful of all legislative contrivances and I have no mind to be one. I believe that the greatest constructive party that this country has ever seen, which ruled it for forty or fifty years in glory and in justice and in honesty, is capable of ruling it in glory and justice and honesty again. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If I believed that it could not do anything and was incapable of government, and had no ideas of its own and had a policy amounting to nothing but criticism of "the other fellow," I should not want to get out of it, so dear is it to my heart, but I should want to retire to private life and let my connection with it be noticed as little as possible.

In laying down these propositions of our programme upon the labor and currency and income questions, I have every reason to believe that I am at one with the best record of the Democratic party, with the Democratic bills that are now pending before the committees on Labor and the Judiciary; with the record in the public and private utterances of our proposed candidate, and with the views of the leadership of the Democracy upon the other side.

In laying down my views upon the currency question there are one or two points of difference between some of us in the House yet, which, however, will I think be accommodated; but in the main, in so far as everything except the upbuilding of the insurance or redemption fund in the Treasury in order to make the banks secure their debts to their depositors is concerned—with the exception of that concerning which some of the members of the House committee are not yet altogether in agreement, everything else that I have mentioned is substantially a matter of agreement. Of course, these tariff revision bills are not the expression of a complete tariff revision policy upon the part of our party. They for the most part undertake to designate things that even a Republican, if not a hide-bound "stand patter," could afford to vote for in the general interest. Free art, free wood pulp and print paper, free petroleum and products of petroleum, etc., even Republicans are crying aloud for these! Let us have them now. Later we will give you a general revision.

Now I have declined two or three times to answer questions until my general line of argument was completed; I will answer any now.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to say that the proposition that I have before the Banking and Currency Committee implies a Government guaranty?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. In what way?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, substantially in the way of putting the Government right behind those debts by making the notes receivable by the Government.

Mr. FOWLER. In what way does the Government become liable to pay the direct obligations of the banks?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Have you a copy of your bill with you?

Mr. FOWLER. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Have you your provision for the building up of your insurance or guaranty fund?

Mr. FOWLER. The only thing that they do is to transfer——

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is in the clause of your bill which provides for building up your guaranty fund for depositors, and it is a matter of inference and construction as far as notes are concerned from their Government receivability. I admit, as I said in my main speech, you do not expressly guarantee the notes.

Mr. FOWLER. Nor indirectly.

Later on I shall argue the Fowler bill, and shall undertake to show the House that it does indirectly do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Later on I shall argue the Fowler bill, and shall undertake to show the House that it does indirectly do it.

Mr. FOWLER. I want to state right here——

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would require quite a long argument to do it now.

Mr. FOWLER. I want to state the facts. The guaranty fund is established by transferring from a reserve city a part of the money now held there——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think it will pay us to enter into a debate now. Later on I will take that matter up with you, and we will discuss it.

Mr. FOWLER. Then I will not ask these other questions now. I wish to state that there is absolutely nothing in it except inference on the gentleman's side.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said it was an inference; it is my inference, my construction, and I will undertake later on to show that it is sound, too.

Mr. HARDWICK. Just now the gentleman from Mississippi said something about favoring a recommendation from the President in regard to conferring certain increased powers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. I have not heard all of his remarks, but I desire to inquire of him if his programme includes favoring that recommendation of the President which asks us to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to initiate a rate on its own motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, as far as I am individually concerned; but this morning I have been trying to give as nearly as I could what I judged to be the consensus of opinion upon this side. I do not know that that is the opinion on this side, but as far as I am concerned, I am prepared now, after the experience of the execution of the law in the last two or three years, to do that. Two years ago, when the law was passed, I was with the President then, or he with me, rather, and was not in favor of it. I thought, as he then thought, that we could get along with power to fix rates only on complaint made.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now the gentleman favors it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, my observation of the working of the Interstate Commerce Commission convinces me that we can not accomplish the ends aimed at without going that far.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I have always favored that, and two years ago offered an amendment to that effect on the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, the gentleman did offer an amendment, but at that time it was voted down because Democratic members of the committee and I had agreed upon this side that all amendments, even if we were in favor of them, should be voted down in order to secure certain amendments to the bill which had been agreed upon, as concessions to the Democrats.

Mr. HARDWICK. But that agreement was not binding on this side.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Judging by the votes it was held binding by all Democrats save twelve or fifteen. I suppose the object of the gentleman's question was to show that I voted against the amendment. Not only I, but the minority members of the committee and the entire Democratic membership of the House, except about fifteen men, voted against it and other amendments because of the agreement that had been made with the other side.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Republican party will be held responsible for the remedies that are proposed by the members of the party in the House and in the Senate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I understood the gentleman to make that statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I merely said that the various remedies proposed constituted an admission to the effect that the Republican party had failed to make perfect the laws.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman did cite the Fowler bill and the Aldrich bill and proceeded to condemn the Republican party because of these propositions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I proceeded to condemn the Aldrich bill, and I proceeded to condemn the Fowler bill, but the Republican party will not be responsible for the Aldrich bill unless it passes it, and the Republican party never will be responsible for the Fowler bill. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I was going to ask the gentleman how, if he held the Republican party responsible for the Aldrich bill, he did not hold the Democratic party responsible for the Democratic minority proposition of the Senate which adopts the same form of security.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, there is a difference as wide as that from Mars to the earth between offering a measure as a remedy for existing trouble and offering something as an amendment to the measure which you do not want, the object of the amendment being to render the original measure less noxious and less objectionable. There is an immense difference between these two things.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does the gentleman think it renders it less objectionable to double the amount of the issue and reduce the value of the bond by reducing the security?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not seen the amendment offered, but I have seen in the Washington Post what purports to be the substance of it; and if that synopsis is correct, it consists in these two cardinal ideas; first, to make the note a Government note instead of a bank note, as the Aldrich bill not amended would make it, and, secondly, to strike out railroad bonds as a basis underlying the notes. If that be true, and that is my recollection of it, then, so far from widening the note circulation, it limits it and restricts it in just the proportion that notes would be issued under the Aldrich bill upon railroad bonds. For the same reason it increases the value of the security.

Upon the other proposition I have this to say. The Aldrich bill makes the Government expressly and directly, in so many words, the guarantor of the payment of these emergency bank notes. Now, then, I say that if the Government is to be a payer of a note or the indorser on a note, the express guarantor of a note, then the Government ought to issue the note—it ought to be the Government's own note and not the note of a private corporation.

There is no excuse under the sun for making the Government guarantee the debt of the private corporation unless the Government gets some profit out of the deal. Now, as I understand the Bailey amendment, merely trying to make a great evil a less evil, provides that the notes to be issued under the Aldrich bill which are guaranteed by the Government, shall be issued by the Government and that the bonds of railroads or other private corporations proposed by the Aldrich bill shall not be taken as a basis for the currency issue. Why, Mr. Chairman, at present when a Harriman manipulates the bonds of a great railroad system, he hurts public morality, he injures public ethics, he damages the stockholders of the railroads, he victimizes a few lambs that buy the stock which is put upon the market, but after all nobody is injured except those who put their hands into the fire. It is bad enough as it is. But if railroad bonds are to be received as the basis for a Government currency in the shape of bank notes guaranteed by the Government or notes directly issued by the Government, either one, then every bond and stock manipulation of a Harriman decreasing the solvency of a railroad system is a manipulation of the people's currency affecting everybody, instead of a manipulation merely affecting those who voluntarily put their hands into the fire. I absolutely indorse the Bailey amendment if I understand it, as I have explained it, in so far as it is merely an amendment to a bad bill. I would not indorse it, if the bill as amended by it were proposed as an original and sufficient measure. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, for a clearer understanding of the gentleman's proposition, which, I understand he says officially as the leader of the House on the Democratic side, will be the policy of the Democratic party in the coming campaign——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I have said nothing about the Democratic campaign. I was outlining a legislative programme.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman stated certain propositions which should be put forth, which should be advocated in the campaign, I understand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Advocated in this House. I do not make a Democratic platform.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman proposed to issue currency interchangeable with bonds.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman kindly tell me where the Treasury has any gold reserve or legal-tender reserve to redeem that currency from time to time and where they would get it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I tried to explain that I would drive that currency back by a constantly growing rate of interest upon it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I lay down the broad proposition here now that after a note has left the Treasury Department, the public not paying the tax, the tax has no effect whatever on driving it back. Will the gentleman tell me how it could be brought back by a tax?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Right there I can explain to the gentleman thoroughly my proposition. As the gentleman will see, although the charge upon the note is called by him a tax, it is really an interest rate—a lending by the Government to the bank of an emergency note on deposit of emergency security. Now, the Government says, while that note is out the bank is always responsible for it. The bank has taken it out. The bank has borrowed it. The Government says, If you keep that note not longer than four months you will pay so much; if longer so much more—ultimately at the rate of 12 per cent per annum.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Who will pay?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, the bank which took it out. And so the rate goes up to 12 per cent finally, and the bank meanwhile can pay the note back either by surrendering the identical note or by surrendering any other lawful money of the United States which the bank has. In other words, the emergency currency that I would supply would be an emergency loan upon security with interest paid by the bank. Does the gentleman see how I could get it back now?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would like to inquire if I could have an hour's time? I would like to answer that very proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the gentleman takes his seat, let me ask if he sees now how the money would have to get back?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I see now that the tax has absolutely no effect upon driving back the circulation, and that it never was laid in any other country or ever proposed in any other country for any such purpose. The only reason the tax is laid is to raise the rate of discount and keep it from going out——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I do not yield for a speech. I yield for an answer to a question. Whether it would work by preventing a redundant currency from going out or by driving it back is all one. The tax would drive back an equal amount of currency, and as this note would be a Government note, just like any other Government note, except that it would have upon it the words "Secured by bonds deposited in the United States Treasury," it would make no difference to the Government whether that identical note or another greenback or gold of equal amount were restored to the Treasury. The redundancy in the currency called for by an emergency, and not demanded by normal circumstances, would be cured by the retirement of an equal amount of circulating medium, whether that was identical in form with that issued or not. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will you be good enough to inform me how the time that has been used has been divided?

The CHAIRMAN. Four hours and forty-five minutes have been used by the Democratic side and three hours and thirty-six minutes have been used by the Republican side.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman from New York yield one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. The time is in the control of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; if it is but one minute more.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] one minute.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of the preservation of certain facts of great importance in the political history of the State of New York and of the United States, I append the following editorial from this morning's issue of the New York Sun:

[New York Sun, February 4, 1908.]

THE NEW ATTITUDE TOWARD (HARRIMAN'S) PROPERTY.

The first reference of the Hon. Alton B. Parker to Mr. Roosevelt's now celebrated "change of attitude" toward the property of certain malefactors of great wealth was contained in a speech delivered at Esopus on October 24 of that year, two weeks before the Presidential election. Judge Parker said:

"Gradually and effectively, but surely and permanently, has all this been changed. * * * The scheme of our Government opposes favoritism, but in its administration there has been much of it. Indeed, it has been growing with such rapidity in recent years that these few that have enjoyed favors, contributed either directly by statute or indirectly by the nonprosecution of violations of law, represent control and are possessed of many hundreds of millions of dollars. * * * The trusts are not now opposed to the continuance of the present Administration. On the contrary, it is common knowledge that they have determined to furnish such a sum of money to the Republican national committee as it is hoped will secure the 'floaters' in the doubtful States for the Republican ticket."

True or false, warranted or unwarranted by what he actually knew at that time, the conviction thus expressed by Mr. Roosevelt's opponent in the Presidential contest grew more positive and was by him more boldly proclaimed. Follow now the sequence of subsequent utterances and events. Four days later, also at Esopus, Judge Parker addressed a visiting delegation of Democrats, and said to them:

"This interview [with Senator KNOX] was intended to create a cloud of dust behind which he hoped to hide the charge he did not answer. That charge is that vast sums of money have been contributed for the control of this election in aid of the Administration by corporations and trusts."

Three days after that Judge Parker came down to New York and spoke in the Madison Square Garden. It was then that he gave such form to the charge against the President of the United States as to excite that exalted person's rage. Mr. Parker said on October 31:

"In an earlier utterance I have referred in detail to what is notoriously going on in the matter of the collection of funds by the Republican party for the campaign. * * * The spectacle of demanding campaign funds now presented to this country is, when rightly regarded, of a character to shock the moral sense. * * * Congress creates a new Department of Commerce and Labor. Of that Department the President of the United States appoints a Secretary. That Secretary was his private secretary. Within that Department provision is made for the collection from large corporations, including the so-called "trusts," of information which, it is to be borne in mind, is to be submitted to the President for public or private use, as he may direct. By grace of the same Executive this Secretary, through whose Department this information is collected, becomes the chairman of the national Republican committee. His chief duty it has been, and still is, to collect funds for the purpose of securing the election of the President. And it is more notorious that there has resulted from this organized importunity—whatever may be the precise way in which it is made effective—an overflowing treasury to the committee, of which boast is openly and frequently made."

And then came the comparison with the ways and morals of Abraham Lincoln:

"It is said by Mr. Hay that the character of Mr. Lincoln furnishes the standard for Mr. Roosevelt in his conduct as President. I do not have to pause to hear your thundering 'No!' when I ask, Would Lincoln have done or permitted this to be done?"

Once more during the brief remainder of the campaign, Mr. Parker returned to the subject. In Jersey City, on Tuesday, November 1, he said:

"As I have taken occasion to say before, and I deem it my duty to say again, the trusts are furnishing the money with which they hope to control the election. I am sorry to be obliged to say it. If it were not true I would not say it to gain the Presidency or any other earthly reward. But it is true, and that being so, it became my duty to warn the people against it."

It will be observed that Mr. Roosevelt waited until Saturday, November 5, three days before the election day, and then delivered his fierce denunciation of the charge as a falsehood and of Judge Alton B. Parker as a deliberate and malicious falsifier. The honest indignation, the manly resentment, the righteous vigor of that memorable statement by Mr. Roosevelt must still abide undimmed in the memory of every historically inclined mind. It is almost unnecessary to quote here a few of the phrases:

"Slanderous accusations, repeated time and again by Judge Parker."

"He has neither produced nor can produce any proof of their truth."

"I speak lest the silence of self-respect be misunderstood."

"The gravamen of these charges lies in the assertion that the corporations have been blackmailed into contributing, and in the implication, which in one or two of Mr. Parker's speeches has the form practically of an assertion, that they have been promised certain immunities or favors or have been assured that they would receive some kind of improper consideration in view of their contributions."

"Mr. Parker's accusations against Mr. Cortelyou and me are inventions. If true, they would brand both of us with infamy; and inasmuch as they are false, heavy must be the responsibility of the man making them."

"The assertion that there has been any blackmail, direct or indirect, by Mr. Cortelyou or me is a falsehood."

"I can not understand how any honorable man, a candidate for the highest office in the gift of the people, can take refuge not merely in personalities, but in such base and unworthy personalities."

"The statements made by Mr. Parker are unqualifiedly and atrociously false."

Let us turn from this explosion of indignant virtue, this strenuous denial to all the people of Judge Parker's repeated charge that money had been extorted from vulnerable wealth for Mr. Roosevelt's political benefit by a process which the alleged beneficiary unflinchingly described three days before election as "blackmail, direct or indirect, by Mr. Cortelyou or me"—let us turn to the letter written twelve or fourteen months afterwards by Edward H. Harriman to Sidney Webster. Whatever may have been the mechanism of its final publication a year and more later, in April of 1907, there can be no reasonable doubt that when written by Harriman the statement was intended for no other eyes than those of his sagacious and trusted correspondent. The things alleged in the Harriman-Webster letter, therefore, either represented Mr. Harriman's honest recollection of his intercourse with Mr. Roosevelt preliminary to the raising of the $260,000 of "corruption money," or they constituted the version which Mr. Harriman desired for one reason or another to impress upon Mr. Sidney Webster's mind; and ingenuity would be severely taxed, we think, to suggest a motive on Mr. Harriman's part for communicating to his experienced and honorable friend in this confidential manner anything but the exact facts as he remembered them. This is what Mr. Harriman, twelve or fourteen months after the election, told Mr. Sidney Webster:

"About a week before the election in the autumn of 1904, when it looked certain that the State ticket would go Democratic, and was doubtful as to Roosevelt himself, he, the President, sent me a request to go to Washington to confer upon the political conditions in New York State. I complied, and he told me he understood the campaign could not be successfully carried on without sufficient money, and asked if I could help them in raising the necessary funds, as the national committee, under control of Chairman Cortelyou, had utterly failed of obtaining them, and there was a large amount due from them to the New York State committee. * * * We talked over what could be done for DEPEW, and finally he agreed that if found necessary he would appoint him as ambassador to Paris.

"With full belief that he, the President, would keep this agreement, I came back to New York, sent for Treasurer Bliss, who told me that I was their last hope, and that they had exhausted every other resource. In his presence I called up an intimate friend of Senator DEPEW, told him that it was necessary in order to carry New York State that $200,000 should be raised at once, and if he would help I would subscribe $50,000. After a few words over the telephone the gentleman said he would let me know, which he did probably in three or four hours, with the result that the whole amount, including my subscription, had been raised.

"The checks were given to Treasurer Bliss, who took them to Chairman Cortelyou. If there were any among them of life insurance companies, or any other like organizations, of course Cortelyou must have informed the President. I do not know who the subscribers were other than the friend of DEPEW, who was an individual. This amount enabled the New York State committee to continue its work, with the result that at least 50,000 votes were turned in the city of New York alone, making a difference of 100,000 votes in the general result."

It would be to impart but an inadequate idea of the significance of the circumstances here so candidly related to Mr. Sidney Webster by Mr. Harriman if we were to ignore the fact that this discussion of sordid financial details "about a week before election" followed an invitation to Washington written by Mr. Roosevelt as early as October 10, when the President beckoned thus to the railroad financier:

"In view of the trouble over the State ticket in New York, I should much like to have a few words with you. Do you think you can get down here within a few days and take either lunch or dinner with me?"

A little more than a fortnight earlier, on September 23, the President had written to Mr. Harriman a note which seems to have been paraphrased by the President afterwards for use in his defensive, protective, and antiseptic statement to Representative JIM SHERMAN:

"At present there is nothing for me to see you about, that [sic] there were one or two points in my letter of acceptance which I should have liked to discuss with you before putting it out."

And on October 14, four days after the invitation to dinner or lunch:

"Now, my dear sir, you and I are practical men, and you are on the ground and know the conditions better than I do. If you think there is any danger of your visit to me causing trouble, or if you think there is nothing special I should be informed about, or no matter in which I could give aid, why, of course, give up the visit for the time being, and then a few weeks hence, before I write my message, I shall get you to come down to discuss certain Government matters not connected with the campaign."

Thus it appears that when Mr. Harriman went to Washington, at a date identified only vaguely in the letter to Sidney Webster as "about a week before the election," he was sure of a friendly reception, sure of being treated by Mr. Roosevelt as one "practical man" treats another practical man, and, further, he was notified in advance that his assistance would probably be required later in the preparation of the President's annual message to Congress.

We are not undertaking just now to settle the salient discrepancy that distinguishes Mr. Harriman's version from Judge Parker's version of Mr. Roosevelt's fructiferous efforts to extract campaign money from the coffers of predatory wealth. The Judge knew what was going on, but thought that Cortelyou was the extractor. Harriman told Sidney Webster that Cortelyou's efforts were a dead failure, and that consequently Mr. Roosevelt took the business into his own hands. It would be a delicate matter to discuss this question of comparative credibility, particularly as Mr. Roosevelt has denounced both Judge Parker and Mr. Harriman, with about an equal ictus, as malicious and deliberate falsifiers.

What interests us at present, as we have intimated, is the hard, mechanical, crystalline chronology of the incident. When Mr. Roosevelt's wrath was growing hotter and hotter under the reiterated accusations of Judge Parker, when he finally burst forth, three days before election, in the impassioned denials quoted above, is it possible that he, as a "practical man," had already practically deposited the $260,000 of Harriman and his malefactor friends in the Presidential trousers pocket? "About a week before election," says Mr. Harriman to Mr. Webster. That is indefinite. Fortunately, in Mr. Harriman's statement of April 2, 1907, we have a more exact determination of the date of the plucking of the $260,000. Mr. Harriman says:

"A funeral in my family prevented a prompt response to the President's repeated invitation, but finally, about October 20, I was able to go to Washington and see him."

October 20? If that date is accurate, the actual rape of the $260,000 from the bank accounts of the malefactors must have occurred the next day, on October 21, for Mr. Harriman's promptness in such matters is beyond reproach. October 21 was the corruption day. Why, that was three whole days before Judge Parker began his malicious insinuations. The $260,000 had been absorbed and assimilated fifteen days before Mr. Roosevelt's terrible denunciation of his eminent calumniator!

And the question remains: Would Abraham Lincoln have permitted it to be done?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Connecticut desire time now?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would like some time now.

Mr. SHERMAN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not know. I would like to finish my remarks the same as the gentleman from Mississippi did.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think I will yield quite as much time to the gentleman from Connecticut as the gentleman from Mississippi had.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not know how long——

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not yield unlimited time to the gentleman. If the gentleman will state how much time he desires——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would like an hour and a half.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not yield the gentleman an hour and a half, but I will yield one hour to the gentleman.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Committee, I wish to express my thanks to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], for so generously providing time for me to reply to some of the propositions advanced by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. Of course, it is apparent that I did not intend to make any remarks on the currency question at this time. At the very beginning I want to call the attention of the House to this fact, that there is a striking difference between the panic of 1907 and that of 1893. The panic of 1893 was the result of a profound distrust of Government money, and was manifested, in the first place, by a withdrawal of gold from the Treasury by the presentation of greenbacks for redemption. That withdrawal and hoarding of gold made a shortage in the total volume of money, and even the silver dollar, which had caused the distrust of the greenbacks, speedily went to a premium of from 3 to 4 per cent. Then we had a condition similar to that of last October and November, and the banks began to take out new circulation.

Immediately there was a redundancy of currency, and in December of 1893 the bank notes were going back into the Treasury in bales with the strings uncut, and money on call in New York was at 1 per cent. We have been through a similar experience this past year—not from the same cause, however, but resulting in like conditions. The panic of 1907 began with a distrust of individual credit and a profound suspicion of the banks managed by the men whose credit was so distrusted. The causes lay deeper, but they were first manifested in the weakest spot. What were the conditions which brought the panic about? They were world-wide and not confined to the United States. I have seen no more comprehensive statement of them than that found on page 62 of the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency. He says:

THE CRISIS OF 1907.

Certainly since as long ago as the date of the San Francisco catastrophe there has been no lack of warning indications of financial troubles and possible business disaster. For at least ten or twelve years there has been an era of advancing prices and great industrial, commercial, and speculative activity in all the countries of the world. Credits have increased and multiplied until the limit has been reached in the amount of reserve money on which they must be based.

For at least two or three years, however, it has been becoming more and more evident that there must soon be a slackening of pace if we were to avoid a general and universal crisis in financial and commercial affairs. These conditions have been world-wide and not by any means confined to the United States. Crises of more or less severity have arisen in several important countries. As is always the case when there is a demand for liquidation, it first manifested itself in the stock market.

On October last I was in Cairo, Egypt. I was not here during any part of the continuance of the panic and I only saw it from abroad. I started for home with the profound conviction that my duty was here, to vote "No" on almost every proposition that, from former experience, I judged would be likely to come up for consideration. Now, let me tell you what I saw coming home. In Egypt I found a paralysis of trade. Egypt had taken its medicine six months before and was slowly convalescing. I found that prices had advanced so that the buyer and seller stood facing each other unable to transact any business whatever. Land values had gone from a few cents per square meter to a hundred dollars per square meter and lands were unsalable. Why? Because the sellers could not get the incumbrances which they had placed on them and buyers would not pay the prices demanded. The gold of Europe had been poured into Egypt and there they stood and stand to-day paralyzed. I got over into Europe and found the bankers in Italy wondering why everybody came and demanded gold. My own courier started back to Paris to draw from a bank there every dollar that he had in the world—$3,000—and nothing that I could say as to the folly of such action seemed to have any effect upon him.

I found in Europe the official bank rates ranging from 7 to 10 per cent—9 per cent in Russia, 8 per cent in Germany, 7 per cent in the Scandinavian States, 7 per cent in Great Britain, the highest there that they had been in thirty-four years, and the only place where reasonable rates of discount were being maintained was in France, and there the old Bank of France, in addition to making a loan to the Bank of England of $15,000,000 in gold, held out its hands and said to the merchants and business men of France, "Come on; we will discount your paper at 4 per cent." Oh, no, gentlemen; the conditions of a panic were not all confined to the United States.

I arrived in England the last of November. I met a friend there who showed me a letter, and I am going to tell you just what was in it in order that you may understand the situation. He had a bank account in Berlin, but had transferred his office to London during the year. Fearing that he would also transfer his bank balance, the Berlin bank had written him, offering 4½ per cent interest on such amount as he would leave subject to check at sight, 6 per cent on any portion that he would guarantee to leave three months, and 7½ per cent on such portion as he would leave six months. Conditions in Hamburg were worse than in New York or any city in the United States in the month of October. I could go on and demonstrate that to you by actual facts which came under my personal observation. But I want to read to you a few words from a speech made by Sir Felix Schuster, the president of the English Bankers' Association, and published in the London Times the latter part of November, during the time that I was in London. Speaking of their own conditions, he says:

It would be too much to say that the American crisis was entirely to blame for the pessimistic situation as regarded values on the stock exchange. Other causes had contributed to the value of money having been for some time past maintained at a fairly high level and to the low prices of investment securities. Remarkable activity in trade and high prices for commodities, such as had prevailed all over the world, could not be without their effect. The consequences to our manufacturers had been of great importance. Working expenses had so increased that many had been compelled to put all available profits into their business, or to sell investments, or had been forced to borrow heavily.

DEMAND FOR MONEY.

There had been such a demand for money from the manufacturing and industrial classes that the amount available for investment purposes had been much smaller than in normal times, while the creation of new investment securities had been on an abnormal scale, although this country last year had witnessed a considerable diminution in this respect. If there was a reaction in trade, and the general indications pointed to it, the demands on the money market would be lessened, but he did not think for a little time to come, at all events, they could expect low rates, as there were too many borrowers having good enough security to offer who were only waiting for favorable opportunities.

And then he calls attention to the fact that British consols had fallen 26 per cent in the last six years. Gentlemen, just suppose for a moment that our Government bonds had dropped 26 per cent in the last six years, as British bonds have. What would have been the effect on our bond-secured bank-note system? And yet a protracted war such as the South African Boer war, with a corresponding increase of our bonded indebtedness, would in all probability cause just such a result.

Then he refers to the American crisis:

As to the American crisis, that had arisen out of overconfidence, brought about by an abnormally prosperous state of affairs. Americans had an unbounded belief in the future of their country; they had also a way of discounting the future somewhat too rapidly. Legitimate enterprise was followed by speculation, and speculation based on credit. Vast undertakings were embarked upon in the expectation that cash in any quantity was always at hand and lenders willing to provide it; and then suddenly it was discovered that the strain had become too great. It was very difficult, indeed, to estimate the effects which would be produced by the measures devised within the last few days by the American Government. Some good judges seemed to think that they might lead, before many months were over, to the reexport to this country of large amounts of gold just imported, especially if some of the short-dated investment securities held by Europe were not renewed. This would, of course, have important results to our money market. Be this as it might, the best opinions were that the worst of the crisis was now over and that the drain of gold from this country would be considerably lessened.

And yet, gentlemen, when I came home the first thing I learned was that Theodore Roosevelt was solely responsible for conditions here, conditions which I had found to be world-wide. Was Theodore Roosevelt responsible for the New York Life Insurance scandal? Was he responsible for the infernal robbery of the Chicago and Alton Railroad? Was he responsible for the steal that took the very life out of the New York street railroad system? Was he responsible for the speculations in copper, and for other syndicates and combinations which have been plundering the people by prices artificially raised beyond the point of possible consumption? And yet thousands of men, some of whom would not know the difference between the progressive ledger of a modern bank and the Rosetta stone in the British Museum (for both would be hieroglyphics to them), are attributing the financial situation here in America solely to the honest efforts of one honest man to attempt to enforce the law in the United States of America. [Applause.]

Let me quote from the speech of a man who by reason of his position can not help but know whereof he speaks.

I refer to Alexander Gilbert, president of the New York Clearing House Association:

ALEXANDER GILBERT CHARGES ALSO, IN AFTER-DINNER SPEECH, THAT WEALTHY MEN HAVE BETRAYED THEIR TRUSTS.

Alexander Gilbert, president of the New York Clearing House Association, used plain language last night in regard to the financial situation, speaking at Plainfield, N. J., at the fortieth annual banquet of the Plainfield Young Men's Christian Association, of which he was the first president.

Turning a pale and haggard face to the cheering banqueters, he said: "I am desperately tired, gentlemen. I have been through the most trying week of my life and am absolutely worn out.

"You know what stirring events have taken place. Large institutions have crumbled to pieces or threatened to crumble at a touch.

"When I say a touch, I mean just that—a touch—a corrupt touch—a touch of corruption.

"You know it has been the custom of recent years for rich men to get control of financial institutions and from that control work on to the establishment of a chain of banks, using the collateral of the larger institutions to gain control of smaller banks.

"When the main bank goes," he continued, "every one in the chain goes with it. That is what we have been witnessing."

Mr. Gilbert was thoroughly aroused. His voice rang as he added:

"Men of wealth—all the more shame that it should be men of wealth with no need of it—enter into these enterprises and instead of administering the affairs in their hands with conservatism and integrity use them to further their own interests and betray their trust."

Interrupted by an outburst of applause, Mr. Gilbert paused for a moment, adding when his voice could be heard:

"I ought perhaps not to speak of it on such an occasion as this; but the greed for gain and the love of wealth and extravagance have so honeycombed society and business life that men should cry out from the housetops and in the market places."

Mr. Gilbert in closing paid tribute to President Roosevelt in these words:

"Many believe that the financial troubles and the contraction of the volume of business are owing to the utterances of our honored President. But I want to say, though he may be impetuous—all great men have peculiarities and do and say things for which they might be criticised—it is my earnest conviction that four years of Roosevelt will do more to elevate and purify the moral and business sense of this country than anything that has been brought to bear upon it through the last decade."

So much for Mr. Gilbert's view of the situation. If any man understands it, he does. What about the English view of our future? I quote from the London Daily Mail of November 20:

THE OUTLOOK—IS THE CRISIS OVER?

Though it is always an ungrateful task to throw cold water upon roseate hopes and anticipations, the British public would do well to receive with caution and restraint the reports that the American crisis is over. It is a story which has been repeated at intervals of about forty-eight hours ever since the moment when that crisis first made its existence felt in so unpleasant a manner. The action taken by the American Government may have checked the feeling of absolute panic, but it can not undo the effects of the past two months or instantly repair the profound organic injury to finance and to business.

And then, referring to the issues of Panama bonds and 3 per cent certificates, the writer adds:

There are, however, two risks which must be considered. The fact is that the public, having seen paper money lose part of its value and a frantic demand for gold spring up, may still prefer the good red metal. In that case the new paper money will at once depreciate in value. A second risk is that if the paper money is readily taken gold may be exported from the United States. The foreign merchant or trader or investor does not want to be paid in American paper, however good. He prefers gold, which commands its value anywhere. It must further be remembered that the financial crisis has already affected every American industry. It is no longer true to say that American business conditions are thoroughly prosperous. All want money and credit for extensions or the prosecution of current business, yet credit is no longer to be obtained. This damage and injury can not be repaired by the wave of a wand or a Government issue of notes. A prolonged period of convalescence is required.

These were the conditions as I found them. I am glad to say that they have since greatly improved. What are the legislative remedies which are now proposed?

Gentlemen, during the last two weeks I have been studying banking bills. I have taken all that I could find in the Committee on Finance in the Senate and the Committee on Banking and Currency in the House, and I have found seventy-nine panaceas for the existing condition, every one of them, in the honest belief of the author, guaranteed to cure the situation.

Now, my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] certainly did hold out the idea that the Republican party is responsible for the propositions that are put in here by men on this side. I will admit it if he will concede that the Democratic party is responsible for the bills that are put in on his side. What have we got? Every conceivable financial notion that it is possible for the human mind to invent. The gentleman from Mississippi talks about the Aldrich bill, authorizing the issue of bank notes based on the pledge of bonds of States, towns, cities, school districts, and railroads as security for them. Why, that is nothing. A Democratic Member of Congress has introduced a bill here authorizing cotton as a substitute for bonds. [Laughter.] Others propose land, practically going back to the old French system of assignats.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does not the gentleman think that cotton is just as good to issue bonds on as railroads?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Neither of them is good for anything as the basis of an honest currency, redeemable in gold. [Applause on the Republican side.] The underlying principle is bad. A bank of discount and issue is chartered as a commercial institution, to provide for the business requirements of the community in which it is located. If it locks up its funds in bonds or long-time permanent investments, it nullifies the purpose for which it was created and at the same time trenches upon the prerogatives of the savings bank, trust company, or other financial institutions which pay interest on deposits on which time can be called and hence can make such investments with safety to themselves and the depositor, also. But let me give you something of an idea of what is here awaiting your decision, gentlemen. The remedies are like the devil in Scriptures. Their name is legion. They cover every conceivable thing you can think of. Why, gentlemen, you remember, some of you, that back ten years or more ago, when the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee had a dinner one night down at the Shoreham Hotel and put the question squarely to the then Speaker of the House whether a financial proposition could receive consideration on the floor of this House. Mr. Reed rose, and with that inimitable drawl which characterized him, said:

If the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee will find six reputable householders in the United States who will agree upon a financial proposition, I will agree to recognize him.

[Laughter.]

Now, then, what have we got? Greenbacks, I am not criticising you.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Don't. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I am not criticising that side of the House. I have never in the thirteen years I have been in Congress discussed the currency question or the money question from a partisan standpoint, and I do not propose to do so now. I say that Republican inflation is just as dangerous as Democratic inflation. [Applause.] It is the character of the proposition that I propose to criticise, not the source from which it comes. But, gentlemen, if you study what your committees have before them, every man of you will see that there is to-day as great a danger of inflation by paper money as there was in 1896 by silver money; and it is a good time to stop and think.

Greenbacks, interconvertible bonds; we have just had the latter announced by the gentleman from Mississippi as his remedy; and his colleague on the other side of the Capitol proposes to supplement that by issuing legal tender greenbacks or bank notes based on cotton bales. Asset currency; guaranty of bank deposits, which the gentleman from Mississippi stood sponsor for. Clearing-house currency and currency secured by miscellaneous bonds, cotton, real estate, and central reserve banks, and a miscellaneous assortment of others, but all of them, or most of them, based on the theory that one debt can be paid with another, and ignoring the fact that gold is the only international money with which debts can be paid.

Let us see for a moment about this guaranteeing bank deposits. Among these seventy-nine panaceas, there are twenty-seven of them looking to the guaranteeing of bank deposits as the remedy for this situation. Now, there can be but two kinds of guaranty; either a tax laid by the Government or mutual cooperation of the banks. I take the ground here squarely, and I think the gentleman from Mississippi will agree with me, that the Federal Government has no right to lay a tax upon deposits, the proceeds to constitute a fund, not for its own use, but to pay the losses of somebody else. I think the Constitution, which some of us forget is in existence, stands squarely in the way and across the path of my Democratic friends, as well as my Republican friends, who would venture on that line of legislation. [Applause.] What is the difficulty with reference to a mutual guaranty by the banks? I think it could be done by mutual agreement, if you could get the banks to do it. But they will not. No man, on the merits of this proposition, can give me a reason why you should guarantee a bank deposit and not guarantee a life insurance policy. One is for the benefit of the widow and the orphan, the other for the well-to-do man doing business. Savings-bank deposits are not covered by this proposition. It is not proposed to include these. Your guaranty simply covers commercial bank deposits. If the Government is going to begin guaranteeing all these deposits we will have entered upon a very dangerous experiment, for they aggregate $16,000,000,000.

Now, in the first place, who owns the deposit? Does the bank? Not at all. It is a liability of the bank. The depositor voluntarily, of his own free will, and generally acting intelligently, and for his own convenience and accommodation, places his money in a bank, where it is subject to his check at any time, and you propose, either by a Government tax or by a forced assessment upon that money, to compel these depositors to guarantee each other and then make the stockholders of the bank pay the bill. That is a good way to have a tax paid; and if you can have it paid by the other fellow, do it every time.

Now another thing. Seventy-five per cent—in my judgment nearer 90 per cent—of the commercial deposits of the country are the result of discounts of commercial paper, accommodation paper, and collateral paper, entered upon the books of the bank to the credit of the men who present the notes. For example, I take my note to the bank for $100, and say I want it discounted. The bank discounts it and puts the proceeds to my credit. What have I done? I have exchanged my credit on time for the bank's credit on demand. That is all there is of the transaction, and it is a business transaction for which a full consideration has been mutually given.

Now then, who would say that the Government should step in and guarantee one party to the transaction and not the other? Why protect the book credit to me and leave the note credit to the bank unprotected? If the notes are all paid, there will be no trouble about paying the deposits. I can conceive of conditions where a Government guaranty of such deposits, after the notes were discounted, would be practically equivalent to a Government indorsement of the note before it was discounted.

And I say to you that a Government guaranty of bank deposits in this country will open an era of the wildest speculation that the country has ever seen. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why enter upon such an experiment when any depositor can insure his own deposit in existing insurance companies as he insures his life and property; and may insure even his ledger accounts in his other business transactions?

Now, let us take up another proposition. I have hesitated very much, indeed, to consider, or, in open session of the House, to refer to what is known as the Aldrich bill. I should not do so at this time if it had not just now been discussed by the gentleman from Mississippi, and I feel that it is my duty, because of that reference, to speak of it now as related to the general subject of financial legislation.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman allow just one question?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. I understand you to maintain that a law which would make deposits absolutely safe in national banks would open a field of the wildest speculation?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not maintain any such thing. I wish that every mercantile credit, every merchant's accounts on his books, every life insurance policy, every fire insurance policy could be made absolutely good; but the only way I know of by which you can guarantee those things is by the voluntary act of intelligent men and by universal honesty.

Mr. HARDY. Then, the question is simply this: I understand you to maintain that if a guaranty policy under a voluntary assessment is effectual, it will open a field of wild speculation?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The only man who has yet realized the impossibility of doing it in any other way in all these twenty-seven bills that have been introduced is Senator CULBERSON, of Texas, who has introduced a bill covering a mutual proposition where banks can come in or not come in, as they see fit.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] presented the same idea here this morning.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Probably he took it from Senator CULBERSON.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know where he got the idea, but that is what he said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Senator CULBERSON and I had a conference together.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. We on this side have been held up as responsible for the Aldrich bill, and yet, according to newspaper reports, the Democratic minority have succeeded in doubling the amount of the notes to be issued, in reducing the value of the securities to be pledged, and increasing the percentage of issues against such securities.

What is the proposition? That we may issue $500,000,000 of bank notes against $555,000,000 of promiscuous bonds, such notes bearing a tax of 6 per cent annual interest charge. Now, if a bond is good security, I concede with Senator MCLAURIN that cotton is better. It is more liquid. It will find a market quicker; it will always be for sale. I concede that iron ore is better, that copper is better, than the promiscuous bonds which it is proposed to take as security for these notes. All of these things have an international market, but town and school district bonds do not. I concede that. But do we want any more money? Is that our crying need? Why, gentlemen, we had money enough last year to do 50 per cent more business than we are doing this year. I refer to 1906 as against 1907; and we have about two hundred millions more now than we had six months ago, and more than half of that increase is real money—gold. Our per capita circulation on February 1 was $35.61, as against $21.48 in the panic of 1893. The volume has steadily increased since that time, and compared with our commercial rivals, the talk of an insufficient circulation or medium of trade seems ridiculous. The last report of the Director of the Mint gives as the per capita of Great Britain $16.33; Germany, $25.03; Canada, $24.41; Austria, $10.74; France, $40.88; Belgium, $25.22; Denmark, $15.15; Japan, $4.35; Mexico, $10.88; Russia, $7.09; Norway, $8; Spain, $19.35. So that if the quantative theory is worth a cent in actual practice France and the United States should at this moment be reveling in prosperity, while most of the remainder of the commercial world should be in a state of paralysis. I leave that problem with you to solve. But there was no trouble about money in 1906. You waked up to the fact in 1907 that there was a scarcity. Why?

Because people began to get distrustful and scared of certain men and certain so-called "business transactions" and fearful of the results of stock-gambling methods in New York and began to hoard their money. I challenge anybody to offer any legislation here that will stand in the face of the scare of 85,000,000 people and their desire to hoard money. It is perfectly useless to attempt to do that.

I went down to the Treasury Department the other day, and I said to the gentleman in charge of the Comptroller's Office: "Please give me the amount of withdrawals that are being asked for." What were they? Twenty-seven million three hundred thousand dollars was the aggregate of note issues for which the banks were applying for withdrawals on January 17, 1908. Money is now being loaned on call in New York at 1¼ per cent, and you can borrow all you want on time at 4 per cent. Where is the necessity for hasty, ill-considered legislation now? [Applause on the Republican side.] Furthermore, I am greatly afraid that between now and next January we are not going to need nearly as much money as we thought we would to do business. I see one of my Democratic friends nudging his Democratic friend as if that was a fatal admission. No; I say, be honest about these things. If we have hard times, admit it, and let us try to get at the bottom of it and see what the causes are.

Mr. HEFLIN. What the Democratic Member meant by nudging his fellow-Democratic Member was that by that time the Democratic party will have been elected to power, and the people will not hoard their money, as they do now under Republican power in this country. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not believe—well, I will not get into any partisan politics on this question. I never have, and I will not now. If I can not discuss the money question on economic principles, I will not try to discuss it at all. It ought not to be a partisan question.

Now, I say that any bill that provides for the issue of emergency currency based on promiscuous bonds and redeemable by the Treasury of the United States is vicious in principle, and I will demonstrate to you if you will give me time that it can not help but result in a wild inflation.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would rather not now; I would rather go on. In the first place, I want to say to the Members of this House, most of whom come from country districts, that this bill or any other, no matter by whom brought forward, if based on that kind of security is utterly useless to country banks, for the cost of it is prohibitive, except in speculative centers. Take out your pencils, for I want to give you a little figuring right now. What is that circulation going to cost? As a fair proposition, in normal times, a good first-class 4 per cent bond of New York City, of the city of Columbus, Ohio, or Yazoo City, Miss., or any other good, bright, smart town in this country, is worth $110, and that in a time of emergency, when banks would need to issue this circulation because of the exhaustion of their loanable capital, money throughout the United States will average to be worth 6 per cent. Isn't that a fair proposition? Let us take it on that basis. I buy, in order to avail myself of this circulation, a $100 bond and pay $110 for it. I lose $6.60 interest on it, because the money is worth that and I could loan it at that without buying any bond at all. I get back $4, the interest on the bond. My loss is $2.60. I take my bond and go to the Treasury and deposit it and get 75 per cent circulation.

Mr. FOWLER. Ninety per cent.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Ninety per cent in some cases and 75 per cent in some. I get 75 per cent of circulation, and what is the rate of interest? I have lost $2.60. It is 3.46 per cent. That is not all the loss. I have to keep a 5 per cent redemption fund, on which I shall lose 6 per cent, and that adds three-tenths of 1 per cent, and then, in addition, I pay 6 per cent tax, and that circulation is costing me 9¾ per cent before I lend it. Now, gentlemen, is that a good proposition to put up to the manufacturers of New England or to the cotton growers of the South and to the farmers of the West, that when they want year by year to move their crops the banks will have to pay from 9 to 9¾ per cent for the circulation. You can't get away from it. The utter absurdity of a proposition of that kind is such that it only needs to be stated to intelligent men to convince them of it.

Now, my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] said the tax was necessary to get it back when the emergency was over. I will come to that directly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman will do me the justice to remember that my proposition began with a very low rate of interest.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I don't care where it begins nor where it ends. I simply say that in every case it adds to the rate of discount, and while paid but once a year by the bank it is paid over and over and over again by every borrower, every farmer, every manufacturer who goes to the bank to borrow money.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would be true if that was the only bank lending money, but as they are all lending it and competing with each other it would not follow.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Stop and think where panics start; think over the panics that you remember in the history of this country. Every one of them starts in the great money centers, and so far as our experience is concerned every single one of them has started in the city of New York. What would this bill do for New York City? If you will take the statement from the Comptroller's report of December 3 and figure the extent to which the different localities of the country could avail themselves of the provisions of this bill, you will find that New York City could take out $161,000,000 of this emergency currency, and that it would require about thirty States in the South and West and on the Pacific coast to secure a like amount. These are approximate figures only. But consider another feature of this proposition.

I read in the Washington Post this morning a statement of what would have happened in case this bill had been in operation on the 24th day of last October. It was pure theory. This is what would have probably happened. Let me see if I state it correctly: The country banks all over the United States had hundreds of millions of dollars on deposit in New York as a reserve center. There came a panic. Every bank in the United States called for its reserves. They were reserves as they stood in New York. Now, with the Aldrich bill in operation, what would have happened? The New York banks, with a margin of one hundred and sixty-one millions which they could have taken out, would have taken it out, whether it cost 8, 9, or 10 per cent to send you the money. You in New England, you in the West, you in the South would have got those bills, wouldn't you? That is emergency currency. That is the purpose for which it is issued. Well, gentlemen, let me tell you when you got it you would have been worse off than if you had left your money in New York. Why? Because your money on deposit in New York was reserve against your deposits, but the minute they paid you their emergency circulation and sent it to you, it is not reserve money, and it only counted for a dollar, but you would have been compelled to accept it, for those notes are legal tender between banks, although not a legal tender to individuals. And of course they would send it to you and keep their legal tender themselves, and when you got it you would have three-fifths less reserve than you had before you got your reserve deposits cashed. Is not that right? [Applause.] Absolutely.

I read last Sunday in the New York Herald a long statement of the reasons why this bill should be passed, and it was written by one N. W. Harris, of the firm of N. W. Harris & Co., one of the great bond dealers and brokers in this country. As I read it I thought of an incident that occurred in Hartford, Conn., one day at the board meeting of the old Hartford Bank, of which Mr. Boulter was the president. He brought in a list of notes one day and presented them for discount, and he read off one note after the other and told what kind of responsibility attached to the makers and indorsers. Finally he came to a note of $200, and he said:

Gentlemen, this is a good note; it was given in payment of a horse. I have inquired in regard to the maker, and I am told that he is good; I am told so by responsible men, and especially by a gentleman whom I met just outside of the bank and who seems to be standing there and waiting for some purpose or other. He says that this note is good beyond question. I therefore recommend that it be discounted.

Just then one of the directors who had been lying back in his chair apparently asleep during the meeting of the board woke up and said:

Boulter, that is the man that sold the horse, and he is waiting for his money.

[Laughter.]

I am afraid that Mr. Harris is the man who wants to sell the horse, and is waiting for his money. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, let me tell you what could be done under this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is the gentleman talking about the Aldrich bill now?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I am talking about the bill that my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] talked about. Let me tell you what can be done. Last year we redeemed 40 per cent of the bank notes of the United States through the redemption bureau. That means that it takes two years and a half to redeem the entire circulation. That means that the average life of a national bank note is fifteen months. Now, then, along comes next fall and you want to move your crop of cotton. What happens under the terms of this bill? They take out the emergency circulation and send it to you, and you buy your cotton and ship it to market. The next fall the same thing can be done again before the fifteen months expire and possibly some squeeze of the shorts on stock or grain exchanges may cause another emergency and justify another issue between the crop-moving periods, so that at least two and possibly more issues of the entire volume may be outstanding at the same time. Oh, but you say there is a 6 per cent tax on it and that will bring it back. I want to tell my friend from Mississippi that he is mistaken, that the tax has no effect on bringing back that circulation and can never have any effect, and I will show him why.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the gentleman's friend never said that the tax would drive back that circulation. The gentleman is talking about the Aldrich bill. A 6 per cent tax would never drive it back in Mississippi, because money is worth 10 per cent there.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I am talking about the operation of a tax. Why? The moment the bank note passes out over the counter of the bank, the bank paying the tax and the people not, the people who have got it in their pockets have no interest or care whether there is a tax on it or not, and they are not going to hasten it back, and it will have no effect upon it whatever. "Oh," but says my friend, "the bank, being penalized by the tax, will pay into the Treasury an equal amount of legal tender against the time of the return of the notes, thus reducing the total circulation in the country." The gentleman shakes his head affirmatively. I shake mine negatively. It has no effect whatever. Why? Because that money is not kept there. Under the law of the United States it goes into the general fund and is put out for the expenses of the Government, and under the present law redeposited back in the banks, and the volume of outstanding money is not changed one iota, not one penny.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the gentleman did not think that in drawing up a bill to enable this emergency currency to go out under this tax that I was going to neglect to provide when the money came back into the Treasury it should not be canceled.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman forgets his history. Just what he proposes to do was done from 1864 up to 1890, and then we were compelled by the condition of things to repeal that law. Why? Because it was locking up the legal tender of the country. At this very moment there is credited on the books of the Treasury and carried as "Debt without interest" the sum of $52,000,000 paid in by banks to retire circulation. The money itself was paid out long ago. If held or impounded, as the gentleman proposes, it would necessitate the banks reducing their discounts to the extent of from two to three hundred million dollars, against which it is now held as a reserve in accordance with law. The gentleman is figuring that the bank note for a dollar and the legal-tender note for a dollar both stand on an even footing. They do not for reserve purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My emergency currency is not a bank note at all, but a Government note.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Full legal tender?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. The present law requires these three hundred and forty-odd million dollars not to be destroyed, but any amount above that could be destroyed without any interference——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. And you propose to allow the banks to use that for a reserve, do you?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not propose that——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. But if it is full legal tender they have the right to do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They would have if the law enacting it did not prevent them——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Payable in what? Payable in another promise to pay; that is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; it is payable just like the bank note now.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ultimately all of your paper is payable in gold. As a matter of daily purchase and sale it is redeemable every day in dollars and in commodities, and when it came back it would be kept as emergency currency, or an amount equivalent to it paid by the banks would be kept as emergency currency and reissued only in case of another emergency.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. No piece of paper issued as currency, either by the Government or by a bank, should be allowed to pass into circulation that had not a sufficient gold reserve behind it to guarantee its redemption in gold on presentation. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is no satisfaction to me and it will be no satisfaction to the people of this country to walk up to the Treasury Department with their promise to pay and have the United States Government give them a bond for it. Now, let me show you what could be done under this bill. The city of New York, I think, proposes to issue forty or fifty million dollars of bonds within a short time——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Fifty million dollars.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Fifty million dollars the gentleman from New York tells me. Suppose that he and I want to buy those bonds. We go in and make a bid on them and they are awarded to us—$50,000,000. We can take these bonds and bring them down to the Treasury Department and deposit them as a basis for emergency circulation and we have to pay $5,000,000 and the United States Government issues $45,000,000 of circulation, in effect carrying them for us on a 10 per cent margin. Now, a gentleman on the other side comes in a week afterwards and wants to buy $10,000,000 of those bonds. Can we sell them? Oh, yes. When can we deliver them? To-morrow, and we send a man to Washington to take them up, and all that we have done is to pay 10 per cent of the value of the bonds and the Treasury has carried them on the margin of 10 per cent, as the bill provides that with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury you can issue and withdraw your circulation at will. And what have you done? You have simply made a cold-storage warehouse of the United States Treasury to carry bonds waiting for a market. [Applause on the Republican side.]

There is no question about it. Now, then, I want to call your attention to this fact. The panic of 1893 taught this country a lesson. What was it? That $100,000,000 was not margin enough of gold reserve to carry $346,000,000 of greenbacks and we increased it to $150,000,000 and we——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I ask the gentleman a question? Is it not a fact you reduced the gold reserve instead of increasing it by requiring that the Secretary of the Treasury could sell bonds whenever that gold reserve——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not care for the cause; I am simply stating the case as we found it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has not the gentleman himself on the floor of this House stated that you reduced the gold reserve instead of increasing it?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not know whether I have or not. I am simply citing this case to show that the lesson of the panic of 1893 was, that we had to carry $150,000,000 of gold as against $346,000,000 of greenbacks. But what is the situation now? We have to-day $695,000,000 of bank notes and $600,000,000 of silver outstanding, every dollar of which is as much a gold drawer on the Treasury of the United States, with only one intervening step, as greenbacks are. So you have got thirteen hundred millions of bank notes and silver and $346,000,000 of greenbacks, making about seventeen hundred millions of money which we are obliged to redeem in gold or its equivalent; and you now propose by one stroke of the pen to add $500,000,000, and you have not got a penny in the Treasury, as a reserve fund for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the Aldrich bill that the gentleman is talking about?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Any number of bills scattered all through here [indicating the Republican side] and through here [indicating the Democratic side]. [Laughter.] There are any number of them. Add $500,000,000 more, and not a penny of reserve anywhere for their redemption, for in their final redemption the banks are not required to deposit legal tender, but can substitute other bank notes, while the Treasury itself must redeem them in legal tender. I tell you we are treading on dangerous ground, gentlemen—very dangerous ground.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE]?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly; of course.

Mr. PRINCE. Does not the proposed Fowler bill mean to have the notes redeemable in gold over the counter of the bank issuing the notes?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Absolutely; and if it was not for one or two of the provisions of that bill I would support it.

Mr. PRINCE. All the trouble with the Fowler bill, from the gentleman's point of view, is the guaranty of the deposits?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will come to that in a minute. I am going to take up the Fowler bill, if I have time. I want to call the attention of the gentlemen of the House to this proposition which has been advanced by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that a tax in some way or other will drive notes back into the Treasury. I have proven that it would not. But let me show you the disadvantage that the United States would be under by paying such a tax on circulation. We have to compete with England, Germany, France, Italy, and Canada. I want to say to you, gentlemen, even if the wages of labor were on an equality here and there the competition with them would be a very unequal one if our farmers, manufacturers, and producers generally are always to be compelled to pay twice as much as they do for the use of the money with which that labor is paid. Now, what is the situation? England has no tax, absolutely no tax, on currency. In France no tax, in Canada no tax, in Germany no tax when covered by gold. Seventy-five millions of dollars besides that of uncovered paper has no tax, and then a tax—to get a further issue back? No; to keep it from going out in too great a volume. Italy has a limit of circulation of three times its bank capital, and no tax. What then? After that the banks have to pay all the money received for discounts—all or part of it—to the Government, and of course that stops its going out too freely. It does not help it to come back. In all these countries the outflow of circulation is controlled by the interest rate, and the inflow takes care of itself, for there is only one issuing power, and there is nowhere else for it to go. There is the situation, and do you say that we are going to organize a new currency system and deliberately put ourselves under a handicap by a tax, in competition with every other nation in the world? I do not think you mean to do that, if you will stop and think.

Now, gentlemen, I want to say to you that in my judgment if we are going to continue the bond-secured circulation and perpetuate the practice of paying one debt with another, if we want to do something right now to meet an emergency and tide over until we can think about this matter, my friend, the leader of the Republican side of this House [Mr. PAYNE], makes the best suggestion that I have heard. It is this, and I want you to think it over. I have no authority from him to make the suggestion. I am making it because it has been made to me in the course of conversation. The national banks are now limited to the amount of capital in their note issue. Nobody disputes but that the notes are perfectly safe so long as they do not come in too freely and all call for gold or its equivalent at once. I do not think they will do it if the volume is not increased very much. But the New York banks and many of the large city banks won't take out notes. Did you ever stop to think why? There is a profit of nearly 1 per cent in it. Why do they not take them out? Simply for this reason: They stand in the center of things, and 50 per cent of all the redemptions of the country go through New York City, and under the present law the bank note is redeemable in legal tender, and legal tender is required to maintain reserve.

Now, a New York bank would be foolish to put out a lot of bank notes to-day that would be coming back to-morrow or next week and take the legal tender out of its reserve to redeem them. So that to-day there is a margin of about $250,000,000 which could be taken out if it were not for the limit of the capital of the issuing bank. The country banks are not in that danger, because redemption rarely if ever is called for over the counter of the country bank. Strike out that limit and, without changing another word of the law, the country bank can take out the circulation which the city banks refuse to take and the aggregate limit instead of being the capital would be the limit of the bonded debt of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not catch that.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Take off the limit of capital.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let them issue any amount, regardless of the capital, supposing they had deposited the security in bonds?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Just as they are doing to-day. There would be no risk; the note would be perfectly safe; it would be the safest kind of inflation you could have. Of course it would involve the Treasury in an increased liability for redemptions. The bank would have to meet that liability, so far as it could, for furnishing that legal tender.

In some of the bills—well, we may as well have it out—in the Aldrich bill, if you will read it carefully, there is this—that these notes can be withdrawn by paying them in other bank notes, instead of legal tender, and the burden is absolutely thrown on the Treasury to furnish the legal tender for them. The bill seems to overlook the fact that a bank lends money and from its maturing loans has a constantly inflowing stream of assets with which to redeem its notes, and that though a government borrows, it does not lend and has no constant inflow except from taxation to meet expenditures. Redemption of bank notes is burdening the Treasury with a banking function which, in the utter absence of the banking principle in the Treasury system, it is not qualified to perform. It has carried the burden thus far in an ineffective way, but if that burden is to be enormously increased by a great addition to our paper money the danger is that the next panic will come from a distrust of Government credit, as in 1893, instead of distrust of individuals and banks, as in 1907.

So far I have considered bond-secured currency and its increase as an emergency circulation, and to it in any form for that purpose I am opposed, whether coming from Republican or Democratic sources.

Now, about the asset currency, or the Fowler bill. As I have said, there are two propositions in that bill that I can not concur in. First, the guarantee of bank deposits; second, interest charged on Government deposits in banks or on any other deposits in commercial banks. I do not believe that a bank should be allowed to pay interest on deposits subject to check at sight; nor do I believe that the taxing power of the United States should be used in collecting the money of the people and loaning it out to banks at any time. [Applause.]

With these two things out, in my judgment, the bill is a step in the right direction and worthy the careful and serious consideration and profound thought of the American people. So far as the safety of the asset note is concerned and the certainty of its redemption in gold coin or its equivalent, there is not the slightest doubt; but the cost of the redemption process, in my judgment, will be great. It will cost at least 1 per cent, I think, on the entire circulation, annually, and probably more than that, if the redemption is made effective in controlling the volume of notes. I have told you of the tax in other countries, or freedom from tax, and the competition we would have to meet in that. The trouble is not in the details of our system, gentlemen, but in the system itself. Each independent bank looks out solely for itself and never for the general good. In troublous times it builds up its own reserve at the expense of its neighbors. In all times it issues or retires its circulation without any other thought but that of profit or loss to itself. The experience of the world ought to be of some value to us, and that all points to a central reserve bank as the sole note-issuing bank, with the reserves of all other banks either held in their own vaults or massed in the central institution. I have said that there ought to be but one note-issuing power. I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi in that proposition, that there should be but one note-issuing power, but I will ask him to go back over every Democratic platform that has been made from the beginning of the country down to the time that he came to Congress and see if they do not show that the Democratic party has invariably declared that all the banking business of the country should be absolutely disassociated from the Treasury Department, and you can not have that if it is engaged in issuing notes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman want me to answer that?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do; I ask him to go back to his own party platforms and see if that is not so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Undoubtedly, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic position would be to divorce the Government from the banking business and the banks from the Government business, but we are confronted with a condition of things that we can not revolutionize. I agree with the gentleman that a bond-secured currency is in itself vicious, and if we could revolutionize it all, and originate a new system, I certainly should not subscribe to a bond-secured currency, if for no other reason than this, that it prevents a country from paying its debts.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is right. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I am not in that condition. I am dealing with the actual situation. I am trying to amend a bad and vicious Republican banking system, and in doing that I have offered these suggestions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will illustrate what I mean as to the necessity of having but one note-issuing power. I look around on this floor and I see bank presidents and bank directors, and I am going to propose a question: Did any of you gentlemen, in your connection with the banking system of the United States, when you proposed to issue some notes, or to withdraw them, ever take into consideration the general good, or did you do it merely with reference to the profit or loss of your own bank? Let somebody stand up and show me a patriot who has done it for the general good. [Laughter.] I say, as a bank officer of a number of years' experience, that it never entered into my thought to do it. I always felt that I should be derelict in my duty to our stockholders if I did not consider first the question of profit and loss to our own bank. And you can not get 6,500 independent banks in this country to act in harmony with reference to note issues or with reference to withdrawals, except on the question of profit and loss.

We may as well face that proposition. Now, at the risk of wearying you, I am going to give you the kind of bank that would do it. I do not want to impose on your patience.

Several MEMBERS. Go ahead.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. A few days ago I clipped from the Wall Street Journal—a paper that belies its name, for it is one of the ablest financial papers in the country—this editorial:

THE IDEAL CENTRAL BANK.

While a central bank of issue and reserve would strengthen the financial position of the United States, care should be taken to prevent such an institution from falling under the control either of political influences or of one or the other of the great groups of capital.

You know what that means. It means the Standard Oil Company on one side, Morgan, etc., on the other, the alignment of rival financial institutions in New York City.

Such a bank ought not to be the instrument of destroying the independence of the 6,000 national banks of the country, or of promoting this or that business interest to the exclusion or hurt of some other interest, nor should it become any agency of partisan politics.

That refers to the old times when Members of Congress and other politicians of high degrees thought that the United States bank ought to loan them money without interest and without collateral. [Laughter.] The people said this ought not to be, and I agree to that proposition.

The ideal is that of a bank of banks, so organized that the banks of every section of the country would be adequately represented in its management, owned by private capital, and yet the Government represented, not to the extent of giving it control, but to the extent of preventing the institution from ever being used to the public wrong.

Now, I think you will all concede that if a bank could be organized on that basis, it would be all right, whether it was central or not. I propose to organize a bank on that basis right now. See if I can do it. The thought came to me in this way: In looking over the statements which we receive every day of the condition of the Treasury, I have noticed for a great many years that from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 has been lying there idle, belonging to the national banks. It is the 5 per cent redemption fund. The banks get absolutely no profit from it whatever. It is counted as a part of their reserve, and that is all. I said, why can we not utilize that for the capital of a central reserve bank? I have started on that proposition. The capital to be secured by a contribution of 5 per cent of the capital of the national banks. I do not think we could compel them to do it under their existing charters, but as the charters mature and lapse from time to time—and they are maturing all the time—we could make that a condition of their renewal, that they should take 5 per cent of their stock in the capital stock of a central reserve bank, as we now require them to buy a certain amount of Government bonds. Then what? Why, I would take in our State banks. There is no reason to-day, and nobody can give one except selfishness, why the national banks should have the right of note issue now and the State banks should not. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Oh, but you say they are examined. There is no trouble about that. So are the State banks examined. I will come to that in a moment. I would give the State banks the equal option of taking 5 per cent of their capital stock in the stock of the central reserve bank, and so sharing equally or proportionately in the profits of the note circulation. That would give us a capital of $70,000,000. That stock should not be transferable nor assignable. In case of the failure of the bank the money should be refunded and the capital of the central bank reduced proportionately.

The next thing would be to provide for the immediate optional transfer of the circulation from all of the national banks over to the central reserve bank, and all that would be required would be to pay the premium on the bonds. The bonds would be transferred and with it would go the liability for the note issue. There would be no trouble about it, and you could make it compulsory on the expiration of the charters and make it optional now, and then the State banks would come in and share equally in the profits of the circulation. I would stop the payment of the interest of the reserves, and I heartily agree with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in that proposition to stop the payment of the interest on the reserve and require that so much of the bank's reserve as it kept outside of its own vaults should be kept in the central reserve national banks or in some one of the branches which I would have for each subtreasury city.

Napoleon Bonaparte always made it an axiom in military operations that the general who could bring the greatest amount of artillery to bear on any one given point at any one time, was sure of winning the battle, and I say that the weakest feature of our banking system is found in the distribution and peddling out of the reserve money of the United States upon which is based all of our credit, and its distribution among a large number of $25,000 banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I would like five or ten minutes more.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would gladly yield to the gentleman five or ten minutes.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would stop the payment of the interest on the reserves and require that so much of the bank's reserve as it kept outside of its own vaults should be kept in the central reserve national bank. I would provide that the central reserve bank should be a financial agent of the General Government, as the Bank of England and the Bank of France are in their respective countries, and that it should be the sole depositary of the public money outside of the Treasury, and that it should perform all reasonable duties as such agent free of charge to the General Government; that it should transact no commercial business whatever in competition with the existing banks except through duly organized national and State banks, trust companies, and savings banks, which are under either State or national inspection, with the right to supplement that inspection by an inspection of its own; and always having the indorsement of these institutions or proper collaterals for loans and discounts made to them, and with a limit of ninety-day paper. That is the German system—gold reserve and the balance of the notes covered by commercial paper.

I would relieve the Treasury of the burden of bank note redemption by providing that all notes should be redeemed in gold or its equivalent in legal tender, at the central bank in Washington, and be legal tender to the central reserve bank and to all of its branches, and then give the central reserve bank the right of unlimited issue of notes, as the Bank of France practically has, for it has never reached its limit. Unlimited? Ah, but only as supplementary to the amount of the present bond-secured circulation, which would not be disturbed except as the Government bonds were paid off; such new issues to be free of tax, but to be based on the maintenance of not less than 33⅓ per cent of the issue, in gold in its own vaults, and the balance fully covered by commercial paper of the character which I have already described. We should then have a central reserve bank with seventy millions of capital, and seven hundred millions of deposits. I am speaking on the basis of to-day's figures. Seventy millions of capital and seven hundred millions of deposits and seven hundred millions of bond-secured note circulation—the largest, strongest, most concentrated banking power in the world—outrivaling any other institution in the world.

Ah, but you say people would be afraid of it. Why? It is not because of the power. It was not because of the power of the United States Bank in Jackson's time that its charter was repealed. It was because of the way that power was used. How would I meet that criticism? With an absolutely concentrated banking power, I would absolutely diffuse the control of that power equally among the States of this Union. How? By diffusing or distributing the control of that power equally among the States based on the principle of the present equal representation of States in the United States Senate. First, by a governing board chosen by the stockholders of State and national banks, the banks of each State electing one member, without the interference of any other State, such governing board to include the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer of the United States, and the Comptroller of the Currency as additional ex officio members. This board should meet at least once each month, each of its members receiving, say, $1,200 per annum and necessary traveling expenses.

Now, understand me, the contributing banks of each State, State and national, would meet just as the stockholders of the banks are meeting this month throughout the United States generally and elect a director or member of the governing board, New York to have no voice in choosing Mississippi's member and Mississippi to have nothing to say about New York's member of the governing board. Each bank to vote according to the amount of stock it owns, each State electing its own director. Oh, but said a gentleman from New York, whom I met the other day, "Do you think that would be fair, that a great State like New York, with its enormous banking capital, should have no more control in this institution than the little State of Connecticut?" I said, "Yes; I think it would be perfectly fair. You are meeting now to elect your directors in New York. Do you know of a bank where its directors all own an equal amount of stock?" I do not; and I don't know why it is not just as good a principle in a central reserve bank, putting the States on an equal footing. We trust every franchise, every privilege we have, every privilege of liberty and freedom we have to-day to the veto power of that body over there, the United States Senate. Why should we not be willing to trust the control of a financial system to a governing board chosen equally from each State in the Union? And when that is done, where is there any place where politics could touch it? It is a commercial institution from start to finish, purely a commercial proposition from beginning to end.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman answer me a question?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. In the event that a political question should arise in which the bankers as a class were on the one side and the people as a class were on the other, would not politics touch it then?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not see how. You have a director from each State in the Union, chosen by the banks in the State, State and national. They are chosen every year. There is no place where politics could touch it.

Mr. STANLEY. Would not these directors all be bankers?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Possibly, but not necessarily so.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. In a moment. Second, from this governing board of forty-nine men should be chosen a board of fifteen directors, from an equal number of geographical districts, or equal geographical districts, the fifteen chosen out of the forty-nine, who during their term of office should reside in Washington and meet daily. They should each receive a compensation of not less than $10,000 per year. Third, monthly reports should be made to the governing board by directors and full detailed reports of the bank's condition and changes in its rates of discount published weekly.

Gentlemen, I believe with such an organization of such an institution that the bank discount rate of the United States can become practically not in excess of 4 per cent as against the 2½ per cent rate of the Bank of France throughout the Republic of France.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I understand the gentleman, this bank is not to discount commercial paper except as it is offered by the savings banks, commercial banks, and trust companies.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes; rediscounts.

Mr. SHERLEY. Might not there be a tremendous pressure for preference that could be given by a central bank in regard to the rediscounts of the banks in the various sections of the country?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. In the demand for the use of the money, you mean?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Undoubtedly that is a fair suggestion. I will offset it by this one. In a discussion with a distinguished ex-Secretary of the Treasury the other night on the same question he took the directly opposite ground, that there would not be business enough to justify the establishment of the bank. The gentleman thinks trouble would arise on account of the eagerness to get the funds of the central bank, and the other gentleman took the position that they would have difficulty in loaning the funds.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, unless there were these discounts by the central bank it would not live very long as a profitable institution. Of course the gentleman knows that.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that an organization such as I have proposed calls for no additional bank capital, or rather loanable capital, and consequently no increase or decrease in the demand for discounts which now exists, except as such demand may naturally increase by increase of business and consequent increase of circulation in the future.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman also knows the only possible way in which the central bank would have any profit aside from its circulation would be through its discounts. Now, that being true, for that bank to continue there must be large discounts through these other banks. That being true, a political pressure might come in the way of having special favors for certain banks, State or national, or trust companies——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not see how it is possible for political influence to touch this institution anywhere. I can say this——

Mr. COCKRAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, in the spirit of the utmost friendliness to the gentleman's argument, I would like to ask this question to make plain his meaning to some of us over here. This bank which he proposes, I understand——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not propose, I simply suggest; I have introduced no bill.

Mr. COCKRAN. This bank which the gentleman suggests would start fundamentally with a capital to be contributed by the banks of the country.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. COCKRAN. Then when it came to exercising ownership over this property, instead of having it controlled by a proportionate ownership of all the contributors he would have it exercised according to geographical distribution, as I understand it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. No; my proposition is to have an equal representation on the governing board from each State in the Union and they choose from among themselves the fifteen who——

Mr. COCKRAN. Then he would not have the property, which, after all, constitutes this bank, managed by the owners in proportion to the degree of their ownership, but according to their geographical residence?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would have the fifteen chosen by geographical location. I think there is no more reason for requiring equal ownership by the banks of each State in an institution of this kind than there would be in insisting that the directors of a national bank in the city of New York should be equal owners in the bank which they control and administer now. Mr. Chairman, do not put that gavel down yet. I want to say to you that such an institution located here in Washington, with a board of directors from every State in the Union, familiar with and recognizing the wants and necessities of every State in the Union, would bring the vast resources of the United States to bear on the movement of the cotton crop in Texas, to meet now the unfortunate difficulties of the tobacco growers in Kentucky, and supply the manufacturers of New England and the Central West with funds at a low rate of interest when the crops were not being moved. They could bring the vast resources of the United States to bear as they might see the necessity for them in any particular spot.

Now, gentlemen, do not make any mistake about this matter. I have not proposed any bill; I do not intend to. I stand here asking that this Congress shall apoint a commission to consider this question and to report at the next session of Congress. We do not need any more money this year. [Applause.] We have to-day to meet and conquer the troubles which are upon us as the result of our own actions in the past. We can not go on exercising our own sweet will and stretch our credit to the last degree and not expect to pay the penalty.

I want to tell them a story, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.]

Up in the State of Maine there was a Quaker farmer who had a rich neighbor, and his rich neighbor always worked his men on the Sabbath day. One day one of the men who worked for the Quaker said to him: "I do not see that your ideas of probity, of honesty, and observance of the Lord's day help you any. That man is prospering far better than you are." The Quaker turned to the man and said: "My son, the Almighty does not always pay off Saturday night—but he always pays." [Laughter.] Now, we can not go on stretching our credit, ignoring rascality in high places, ignoring thieves and scoundrels anywhere [applause] and expect that the Lord will bless us in every way. He always pays. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, in addition to the hour and ten minutes how much time did the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] occupy?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut occupied one hour and seventeen minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I have it figured that my friend from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] has occupied four hours and forty-seven minutes, and that on this side we have occupied four hours and nine minutes. Is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, then. We know where we are at. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] fifteen minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chairman, I feel that the members of this committee are indebted to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] for having precipitated a debate that has led to the very able, exhaustive, and instructive speech that we have just listened to, delivered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. [Applause.]

It is with considerable hesitancy, Mr. Chairman, after listening to a speech of that character that I claim the attention of the Members of the House even for a few moments while I endeavor to direct their thoughts back to the questions that in the first instance led to this general debate. They were in their nature, Mr. Chairman, political and not economical. Yesterday afternoon the distinguished and veteran statesman from the State of Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] called attention to the remarkable versatility displayed by our Democratic friends in the equal applause with which they greeted the ridicule and condemnation by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] of the President's message and of the President's course and the almost unstinted approval with which his course and his recent message were commended by the distinguished orator from the State of New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

This morning, after our Democratic friends have had a good night's rest and an opportunity to recover somewhat their equilibrium, and get over the effects of the exhiliration that they experienced when they listened to the eloquence of the gentleman from New York, the leader on the Democratic side [Mr. WILLIAMS] attempts to reconcile the differences between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN.]

I have taken the floor at this time, Mr. Chairman, for a few moments, and I think they will be ample for my purpose to demonstrate, not by what I shall say myself, but from Democratic authority, the absolute insincerity and hypocrisy of the Democratic party, as an organization, in its present attitude toward the President of the United States. I want to quote, Mr. Chairman, from a book issued by Democratic authority.

During the last Congressional campaign, when the President of the United States, in a letter to Congressman Watson, called upon the people of the United States to elect a Republican majority in the Sixtieth Congress in order that the policies of the Republican party, inaugurated under the Administrations of William McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt, might be carried to a conclusion, the Democratic party, in common with the Republican party, issued what was known as a campaign text-book. The Democratic campaign text-book was intended as the source from which Democratic orators should draw their inspiration for the speeches that they should make during the campaign in the effort to secure Democratic support at the polls. In that document, that was issued by the Democratic Congressional committee, known as the Democratic Campaign Text-book, at page 136, appears an article headed "Some of President Roosevelt's inconsistencies—Matters affecting the President." Quotations are given from various works of the President, and after those quotations we find this expression (referring to President Roosevelt):

Even when he tells the truth, he does so in order to disguise an evil purpose or to justify by precedent a wicked policy.

How does that accord, Mr. Chairman, with the utterances that we now hear from our Democratic friends in commendation of the course of the President? Let me read a little further:

Surely—

Says this Democratic campaign text-book—

no one who values sincerity will be influenced by the utterances of Mr. Roosevelt.

And I am going to read a list of the charges which, if I did not give you the authority from which I take them, you might suppose were taken from some of the so-called "subsidized press"

The President—

Says the Democratic campaign text-book—

favors certain railroads and accepts gifts from them, violates the interstate commerce law, demands and receives money for junketing expenses, authorizes deposits of public money in favorite banks without interest, and diverts funds appropriated for one purpose to another, appropriates public money to pay for a literary bureau to boom his policies.

And a little further on we find this—

Mr. Roosevelt has shown a greater regard for the interests of—

Whom—of the people? When the Democratic party was in a political campaign is that what they said? Oh, no; Mr. Chairman, what they then said was:

Mr. Roosevelt has shown a greater regard for the interests of corporations and less regard for the law than any other Executive the country has ever had.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of these utterances and many others that I might quote that have come from Democratic sources from time to time, is it any wonder that we should have raised in our minds the query whether or not the Democratic party is not seeking to prove the truth of the old maxim that "hypocrisy is the homage that vice pays to virtue?" I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that these utterances made by the Democrats at this time are made solely for political purposes, and the whole conduct of the Democratic party shows that that is its only object. It is hypocrisy pure and simple, It is not uncommon, and has not been in the past, for the Democratic party to indorse Republican Administrations when those Administrations have been concluded and their policies carried into effect. They usually indorse Republican policies after the Republican party has successfully enacted them into law. Many of you no doubt, as I have, have heard Democrats who boast in this day that they are "Lincoln Democrats."

How often have we heard Democrats upon the floor of this House and elsewhere extol the virtues of Abraham Lincoln, of Ulysses S. Grant, James G. Blaine, James A. Garfield, and William McKinley? Ordinarily our Democratic friends have at least shown the discretion to withhold their commendations and encomiums of the virtues of Republican statesmen and Republican Administrations until the statesmen have passed to the great beyond and the Administrations have been written into history. This time, however, they are catching up with the procession and are indorsing, while the Administration is still in power and while the statesman still lives, the Administration and the virtues of a living Republican.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BONYNGE. Certainly.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Do you mean by the argument that you have now presented, relative to our lauding the statesmen who have died, that we should wait until Roosevelt is dead before we say anything about him? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BONYNGE. If you desire to be consistent and to follow the course that you have always heretofore followed, you would certainly do so. Now, let me call your attention to the fact that even when you indorse the present Administration you are always very careful to couple such indorsement, as was done yesterday, with the statement, for fear that it might be used against you in the future, that the President has placed himself, by his own statement, beyond the possibility of accepting a renomination. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] said yesterday that the President could not again become a candidate "without perfidy and dishonor to himself."

Our Democratic friends seem also to be disturbed over the fact that we have so many statesmen in the Republican ranks of Presidential caliber and fitted to occupy the Presidential office. They taunt us because we have not yet selected our candidate for President. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that we have not the same paucity of material in the Republican party for a Presidential candidate that the other side of the House are suffering under. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, whether the standard bearer of the Republican party in the next Presidential campaign shall be Secretary Taft or Governor Hughes, Vice-President FAIRBANKS or Senator KNOX, or that stalwart of the stalwarts, whose thirty-four years of experience upon this floor has fitted him for the highest office in the gift of the American people, Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON [loud applause on the Republican side], it matters not. Under the banner of either of these leaders whom I have mentioned or any other who may be selected by the next national Republican convention, the Republican party will march on to victory at the polls next November and will continue to do what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] demonstrated yesterday it has done in the past, write the statutes upon the statute books that will put into effect the policies of the Republican party. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BONYNGE. Yes.

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman referred to me. I did not wish to interrupt the flow of his eloquence——

Mr. BONYNGE. I am sorry the gentleman did not. It would have added very much, I am sure, to my remarks if he had done so.

Mr. COCKRAN. No; I thought it would be better to give an addition to it rather than an interruption, and that is the reason I ask my question now. I ask the gentleman where he heard anything on this side from anyone, indorsing this Administration, as distinguished from a single message? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BONYNGE. I realize, as I said a moment ago, that after our Democratic friends had had a night's rest and a chance to sober down they would desire to amend their speeches of yesterday.

Mr. COCKRAN. I ask the gentleman where he heard anything yesterday to justify his statement?

Mr. BONYNGE. It is in the RECORD, and the gentleman can read it just as well as I can.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that we on this side can only find anything to commend in the President's utterances by taking them on the spur of the moment and without sober reflection?

Mr. BONYNGE. Not at all.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that anybody who soberly reflects can not commend the President?

Mr. BONYNGE. Not at all. What I said was that after you had had a chance to sober down, you would desire to amend the commendations that your side of the House yesterday bestowed upon the President.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let me ask the gentleman to answer one question frankly. Will he say to this House that there is not as much division on his own side in regard to the President's message and in regard to his policies as there is on our side—now, honestly?

Mr. BONYNGE. I have no hesitancy in saying that there never has been on this side of the House anything like the disagreement and the inability to agree upon any policy that there has been on your side. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Answer the question.

Mr. BONYNGE. I am delighted that that disagreement exists——

Mr. SHERLEY. Answer the question, though.

Mr. BONYNGE. I am delighted that upon the Democratic side there is so much difference of opinion. I am glad that you are coming out to my city to hold your national convention next summer. We expect to entertain you for six months, if you are going to carry out Mr. Williams's programme and in that way to recoup ourselves on the $100,000 we have contributed to defray your expenses. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman now answer the question?

Mr. BONYNGE. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that I have already answered it; that there never has been and is not now the disagreement on this side of the House, either as to the policies outlined by the President or any other policies, that there is upon the Democratic side.

Mr. SHERLEY. My answer to the gentleman is that his public statement does not accord with the private remarks of gentlemen on that side.

Mr. SHERMAN rose and was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I want to ask the gentleman from Colorado one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, Mr. Chairman; I do not. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE] thirty minutes.

Mr. NYE. Mr. Chairman, I believe that an indorsement of the spirit and pith of President Roosevelt's message is an indorsement of his Administration and of the Administration of the Republican party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have not risen to indulge in any partisan spirit of debate. I am concerned as a citizen and as a Republican as to the carrying out and the execution of the spirit and principles so emphatically, and to my mind so patriotically, expressed in this message.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the thought of the American people is, more than it ever was before, directed to a study of the ethical foundations of government. As we study the procession of events that pass before us and attempt to comprehend their significance, as we attempt to understand in a measure the forces that are at work in our national life, we are inevitably driven to a recognition of the fact that the foundation of all that is good and enduring is moral rather than material. The criticisms, it would seem, upon the President and his Administration, I regret to say, come largely from business interests, from men whose brain and genius and ability have contributed mightily to the development of this country, but I want to offer a suggestion or two here concerning the matter of business interests in this country.

I am not a business man, but I apprehend that in spite of all the evils that exist there are sound, wholesome, and healthy business interests in this country, and that that sound and wholesome business interest rests on the honor and integrity of the American people and its representatives. [Applause.] Emerson, that great modern Plato, once said "The world is upheld by the veracity of good men; they make the earth wholesome." By this I have no doubt he meant the business world, the social world, the industrial world, for it all rests in the last analysis upon national and individual character and honesty. [Applause.]

Never before, sir, in the history of this Republic has a greater question arisen than this to-day, and, for my part I am glad to see evidences that there are men on both sides of this House that rise above party and proclaim their allegiance to the principles of any leader who believes that the moral forces of this Republic are mightier than the mere forces of money and the money-making power. [Applause.]

It is strange to me that in all the learned discussions upon finance no one has recurred to the deeply written law of the universe, the law of intrinsic value and worth. Why, the measure of value of everything must be according to its real worth, what it earns. Money is worth what it earns. Bonds are worth what they earn. Stocks are worth what they earn. All property is worth what it earns, and I might go a step further and say, Mr. Chairman, that man himself is worth what he earns.

In the industrial world, in the social world, in the great financial world, in the world of business activity, the great primary law is that men are worth what they earn, just as property is. I apprehend, sir, that when the greatest Teacher who ever trod this earth said that "the laborer is worthy of his hire," He announced a law which rightly interpreted means that every honest and well-directed effort of hand or brain has an intrinsic worth which should receive in the great equitable and moral markets of the world its just due. The laborer is worth what he earns, and the dollar is worth what it will bring in the legitimate and healthy currents of trade and investment, and stocks and bonds the same.

But it is the history of frail human nature, it seems to me, to be constantly violating this law, and the great panic which one gentleman on the other side said some weeks ago was due to President Roosevelt, and which is attributed to one cause and to another, that panic, to my mind, finds its cause primarily in the violation of that moral law and precept; in other words, the panic is a financial debauch rather than the use and exercise of the nation's wealth in the legitimate and healthy channels of commerce, or trade, or investment. I am here to say to you and to the nation that I believe in spirit, in purpose, and in motive the Administration of the President of the United States has been a righteous rebuke to all this profligacy of the financial and business world. [Applause.]

The substance of the country was diverted. The healthy blood of the nation congested in schemes of feverish speculation and gambling, and it was the result of the departure from the great moral rules of health that the President of the United States has constantly warned the country and the people against. In spite of the faults he may have—and he has them, as we all have—I regard it as providential that the last six years of the history of this country has placed its national leadership in the hands of a man who has constantly brought home to the American people the necessity of honesty in business and honesty in politics. [Applause.] It is undoubtedly true that an administrative policy which reveals disease in the body politic and which discloses evils in the business world must have some tendency to disturb existing conditions. But he is a poor student, it seems to me, of human history who does not see that everywhere every forward step in wholesome reform from the dawn of civilization has been accompanied by disturbance of existing conditions.

It was because mankind lagged in the march of true progress and because they became indifferent to the primary law that rests underneath all business, all industry, and all progress that it of necessity does disturb what is called business.

Every reformer who went down in his day, obscure and persecuted and perhaps crucified, has lived for good in the generations following, because he advanced in the march and did disturb the evils of his day. Paul disturbed the sinking civilization of his day. He disturbed in a measure the business men who wrought in metals and the men who constructed the silver shrines that were to be used in the worship at the temple of Diana, the goddess. These men said, "This is a pestilent fellow, and he is injuring our craft." I speak to-day for the thousands of honest business men, as well as the honest toiling men of this country, and I ask you leaders of this House if you are willing to flinch from the doctrine of this message of the President of the United States? [Applause.] I am not.

Several weeks ago when the committee was engaged in general debate a gentleman, I think from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], read some extracts from speeches of some of the eloquent Republican gentlemen in 1904, commendatory of the Administration and policies of Mr. Roosevelt. And I take it from the general course of his remarks that he was somewhat curious to know what we were going to say next campaign. I am not authorized to answer for this great party in which I was born and in which I have worked during my life, but I can answer for myself. I shall stand, if I live in 1908, on the same principles and advocate the same doctrine that I did in 1904. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that this great American people will not be deceived. If the issue and the real issue of 1908 is the merit or demerit of this Administration—if that is the issue—if personality and passion and prejudice shall be laid aside and this great party of liberty and Lincoln shall go to victory or defeat according as the American people shall approve or disapprove of this Administration, then I say it needs no prophet to read the verdict of next November. [Applause on the Republican side.] But whatever that verdict or whatever the verdict of any single election, there will be a general verdict of the future and it will place the leader of this day in my judgment among the foremost builders of that which is best and truest and noblest in our American life. [Applause on the Republican side.]

At the center and as the soul of this message and other messages which have come from the President of the United States is the thought which is uppermost in the advanced thinking minds of to-day, and that is the unity of human society, the unity of this nation. He used the expression in his message at the opening of Congress, "This nation must go up or down together." So delicate and so sensitive is the vast system of business, of commerce, of trade, and of industry that no permanent injury can occur to one part of it without a permanent injury to all.

The real prosperity, gentlemen, of one is the real prosperity of all. The real prosperity of the business man is the prosperity of the workingman, and the merchant, and the professional man. We are to-day to counsel together for general good. In other words, whether we would or not, we are our brother's keeper. The thought that is uppermost in this day and age of the world—call it sentimental, or call it what you will—is the brotherhood of man. We are one. Nature and civilization, industry, commerce, everything to-day teaches that our interests are one and that our destiny is one. We must suffer and rejoice together, and that is the spirit of this message. It is an easy thing for men to find fault. I was much touched by one strain of eloquence in the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] yesterday when he referred to the reformer, or the crusader. Alas, but few of us have got the stuff of the crusader. Legislation is too much talk. Too few men there are willing to remove the beam from their own eye in order that they may see clearly to remove the mote that is in their brother's eye. The fact is that the great criticism upon this mighty, patriotic, advancing, and leading people of the world is its love of money.

Human nature seems not to have changed since the days of the great, wise man, and the love of money is still the root of all evil, and the disease is not always local. It has a local manifestation, perhaps. It may break out in great commercial centers, but the love of money, too prevalent generally in our day, seems to be the root of the evil. We are studying the great lesson of the pursuit of happiness. Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, spoken of in the Declaration of Independence, had a sort of history in the nation itself. First, life—a nation born, born out of revolution. Second, liberty; we came out of the great struggle and agony of 1861–1865 and emerged purer and became what we had boasted of being, but what we were not, the land of the free and the home of the brave. And when that was done, when we emerged from the thick darkness of that terrible distress for which we as a nation were responsible, then we began to study the third great principle, the pursuit of happiness.

Thank God, there are thinking and advanced men of to-day who can see that the pursuit of happiness is not synonymous with the pursuit of wealth. Wealth is but incidental to this other pursuit. We are beginning to learn that the pursuit of happiness recognizes side by side with us our neighbor as ourself. [Applause.] In the spirit of this message to-day, in spite of the feeling which possibly might have promoted it, of the exasperating circumstances which may have provoked it, I read at the heart of it the mighty words:

Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them.

[Applause.]

That is the spirit of it, and it seems providential that our leader—and, I thank God, the leader of my own party—has stood forth in this bright morning of the twentieth century to proclaim and voice this spirit of brotherhood of mankind and the unity of all real and enduring interests. [Applause.] The wise men of to-day will follow this light, as did the wise men of the East the star till it stood over the cradle of the infant Christ.

Mr. Roosevelt stands for the conservation of our great national resources from the spoliation and plunder of avaricious and unscrupulous men; for the reclamation of the barren lands within our great domain; for the permanent improvement of our great waterways under a comprehensive system which shall benefit all parts of our land and arm the commerce of the country with a power commensurate with the nation's productive capacity.

He stands for the Panama Canal, which opens an ocean highway to all the world, and he is large enough to see that the healthy development of railway transportation is included in this system of improvement. His plan and policy carried out will cause the streams of national wealth to flow abundantly and normally from all the springs of our mighty resources.

But he stands for more than our material development. When the great coal strike menaced the country with a fuel famine and thousands of toilers in ceaseless night plead for justice at the hands of the mine owners, by a courageous and humane innovation upon former precedent he established a plan of arbitration which relieved the country and averted untold suffering and distress.

At the right moment he took the initiative in the establishment of peace between Russia and Japan, and did more than any other force to bring to an end that cruel and selfish war. And to-day he is doing more than any living sovereign to establish a permanent court at The Hague for the establishment of the world's peace. He is a living prophecy of the day when men shall learn war no more.

Can these things be forgotten in moments of ill temper, and shall we shrink from the application of these principles because it hurts wrongdoers? Never! Let the good work go on, and let us follow a leader who would build the temple of our industrial liberty upon the rock of righteousness and justice.

I say again, let the verdict of 1908, Mr. Chairman, be what it may, there will be a verdict of the future. That verdict will be written by an impartial and nonpartisan historian. Posterity will read it after the faults of Theodore Roosevelt are forgotten, as are the faults of the mighty Washington, of the rugged and heroic Jackson, and of the immortal Lincoln, and I believe that verdict will place this man, for clearness of perception, for fidelity to duty, courage of conviction, for a wise comprehension of public affairs and of his time, among the most illustrious and patriotic leaders our beloved country has ever had. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, we have heard this afternoon some able speeches upon the financial questions of our country, and along the line of the gentleman from Iowa, who has just taken his seat, I desire to offer a few remarks upon the question of the fundamental principles of our Government and the question of the brotherhood of man.

Six thousand years ago the sun of civilization dawned upon the banks of the Nile in Egypt and on the plains of old Chaldea. Since then nations have risen, flourished, and decayed. The storms of time have beaten upon them and they have fallen, because they were not built upon the rocks. Along the shore of the centuries is the wreckage of Babylon, Thebes, Jerusalem, Carthage, Greece, and Rome. In the olden days humanity was divided into two classes—those who ruled and those who served. From time immemorial there have been kings among men. There was an idea that kings ruled by divine right; that it was the function of some men to rule over their brothers, and the mission of others to bow down to those kings. But bye and bye a feeling of human equality began to creep over the hearts of men, and we may see the footprints of Democracy as he has marched through the ages. The magnificent fabric of the feudal system which characterized the Middle Ages crumbled before his increasing breath. Out yonder at Runnymede, a green stretch of meadow along the Thames, six centuries and three days before the fall of the great Napoleon at Waterloo, our English fathers wrested from King John the Magna Charta, the foundation and bulwark of our English liberties. According to this great document, justice could no longer be sold, denied, or delayed; the rights of life, liberty, and property were recognized and specifically secured; no one was to be condemned on rumors, but by the testimony only of witnesses; fines were to be proportionate to the offense; the poorest rustic was not to be deprived of his property arbitrarily, and the property owner was given the right to bequeath the earnings of his toil to his widow and children.

Yonder at Sempach, a small town in Switzerland on the shore of the beautiful lake by the same name, is a band of Austrians, under the command of Duke Leopold. A little band of freedom-loving Swiss, numbering less than half the force of the Austrians, is combating for their rights. Not an Austrian has fallen. Arnold von Winkelried, a knight of Unterwalden, seized with the noble inspiration of freedom, rushes forward, grasps with outstretched hands as many Austrian pikes as he can reach, buries them in his bosom, and bears them to the earth. His companions rush over his body into the breach, slaughter the armor-encumbered Austrian knights, win the battle, and establish the independence of the Swiss.

For fifteen centuries the common man had no rights in France. There in the dark dungeons of Paris, knee deep in the filth and ooze of those unmentionable holes, with their necks in iron bands, eating the mouldy crusts of bread that have been flung to them in scorn, stand some Frenchmen, condemned to that foul imprisonment because they have dared shoot a hare belonging to the King. But look! What is that smoke that is curling over France? What is that rumbling heard in the heart of the nation? It is the awful volcano of the people's wrath; it is the unspeakable French Revolution. But this Revolution taught France, and Europe, and the world the value of a man, and pointed out the swift oncoming of universal democracy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Three centuries ago Democracy leaped the Atlantic and pitched his tents in these wild, western wastes of ours. Nobler blood has never stirred in the veins of mankind than that which pulsated through the veins and arteries of our American ancestors, the men who settled Jamestown and the Pilgrims who founded Plymouth. With the fear of God in their hearts, and without, every known danger of untried seas, sickly climate, savage treachery, and family hardship, they carved out the greatest Government that the sun has ever shone upon. In the undying words of our Declaration of Independence, the corner stone of American democracy, written by one of the greatest Democrats of world-wide history, Thomas Jefferson, is this fundamental principle of democracy that has been marching so swiftly through the centuries:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

Perhaps no great statement of a great and indisputable fact has been so often misunderstood as this great theorem of Jefferson. Even the great scientist Huxley, in commenting upon this statement, said:

> The doctrine that all men are in any sense, or have been at any time, free and equal is an utterly base fiction.

And men even in these latter times have denied the truth of Jefferson's great dictum. It does not mean that all men are endowed with equal physical qualities, intellectual endowments, or moral virtues. In this sense there is no human equality. No two things in nature are exactly alike. Nor did Jefferson mean to imply any such thing as this. What he did mean is this, that in all just and proper government, that in any true democracy, all men are, and must be, equal before the law. In republican forms of government no man must have legal rights that another man does not enjoy. When he does there is no democracy, there is no natural justice, and there is an end to free government.

A few days ago one of the most distinguished professors in the largest institution of learning in America delivered a speech in Chicago in which he is said to have attacked the laboring classes of America. The newspapers of the country report his address under such headlines as these: "Lecturer assails working classes;" "Harvard professor says tyrant privileged classes are country's laborers." Here is a reported extract from his speech:

> The upper classes are absolutely the superiors of the people they have surpassed, and one is disposed to say that God made the reason. The cry which once roused this country was "Taxation without representation." The privileged laboring class of to-day demands representation without taxation. They are now trying to drag us into war with Japan in order to safeguard their own selfish interests. If it were not for the behavior of the labor unions on the Pacific coast, in excluding Asiatic laborers, the fleet would never have had to be sent around Cape Horn.

I do not see the justice of the distinguished professor's remarks. I do not see why he should seek to stir up class strife and class feeling in our country. I do not see why he should seek to discriminate against the great toiling masses of this country, the backbone and sinew of the nation's strength in time of war, and the source of its prosperity in time of peace. I deny that there ought to be any classes in this country. I hold that we are members of a common brotherhood; that the man who works with his pick and the man who works with his pen are common members of a common family, fellow-laborers in the great field of humanity. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I hold that any system of education that teaches me to look with disdain upon the honest toiler and causes me to forget that all men are my brothers is a false and narrow system of education. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The ability to dig a bushel of coal or to raise a bushel of corn is as important a work as the parsing of a Hebrew verb or the criticism of an English sonnet. So long as work be honorable and necessary, I think it little matters what particular thing we do. But it does matter whether we do that thing faithfully and well.

I do not believe that war with Japan is imminent. I believe that the days of the future are to bring us peace and not the sword, but I want to ask my friend from Harvard, in the event of war with Japan, which he seems to think possible, upon whom would this nation rely for the defense of the Stars and Stripes? I answer, upon this same "despotic class" that he mentions—the laboring men of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Since the Lord said to Adam in the far-off Garden of Eden, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," labor has been honorable. The stamp of divine commandment is thereby put upon toil, and since that time work has been the keynote of progress and worth. Better than the assaults of this professor upon the laboring men of America, and this stirring up of class strife, I like this little poem from Denis Florence MacCarthy:

> But blessed that child of humanity, happiest man among men,
> Who with hammer, or chisel, or pencil, with rudder, or plowshare, or pen,
> Laboreth ever and ever with hope through the morning of life,
> Winning home and its darling divinities, love-worshipped children and wife.
> Round swings the hammer of industry, quickly the sharp chisel rings,
> And the heart of the toiler has throbbings that stir not the bosom of kings.
> He the true ruler and conqueror, he the true king of his race,
> Who nerveth his arm for life's combat, and looks the strong world in the face.

The great danger, if there be a danger, menacing our Government, the great danger that confronts democracy in general, is that this fundamental principle of the legal equality of men be forgotten. There is no danger that foreign nations will invade our domains with their hostile armies, to burn our cities and lay waste our fields; none that we shall prey upon one another again, for the bloody days and the sleepless nights of terrible civil strife are forever gone; none that ignorance may bandage our eyes to what is right and best, for the incessant clang of our printing presses, the church spires, and the school bells of the nation are guarantors of our intelligence and our sense of right. But, Mr. Chairman, the chief danger that confronts the American nation, looking far down the vista of the years to come, the chief danger that hangs over democracy everywhere is that this same legal equality of our citizenship shall be lost sight of. Woe to the fabric of Americanism, most splendid ever woven in the governmental loom of the ages, when one man shall not be equal to any other man in this country before the law. There should be no classes in America; there must be none. The corporation is indispensable to our civilization. We welcome it; we must protect its every right. Great railroad systems spanning the continent with their steel girders of commerce, giving employment to thousands and thousands of men, scattering towns overnight in waste places, making the desert blossom and bloom as the rose, are mighty forces of civilization. We must protect them; we must safeguard their interests. But, Mr. Chairman, before the law this great corporation is not, and must not be, a whit better than the poorest son of toil who drives a spike in that railroad, thereby making it possible. [Applause.]

The growth of the democratic spirit in government was the characteristic feature of the nineteenth century. Lecky in Democracy and Liberty, says:

> The most remarkable political characteristic of the latter part of the nineteenth century has unquestionably been the complete displacement of the center of power in free governments, and the accompanying changes in the prevailing theories about the principles on which representative government should be based. It has extended over a great part of the civilized world, and, although it has had all the effects of a profound and far-reaching revolution, it has, in some of the most conspicuous instances, been effected without any act of violence or any change in the external framework of government.

Slavery had existed among men from the earliest times; serfs were sold as chattels with the land upon which they lived; but the sun dawned this morning upon a practically slaveless world. There is no more imprisonment for debt; no more arbitrary confiscation of property; no more imprisonment for fancied offenses. Things are getting better for the common man all the time. The state of human society is improving as the years go by. Tennyson sings:

> For I doubt not through the ages, one increasing purpose runs,
> And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns.

Through the midnight of despotism in Russia come glimmerings of the star of hope. Democracy now reigns over the most of the earth, and it can not be long, I think, until his rule shall be extended over all places where there are governments among men. Let those of us who believe in democracy, in the blessedness of human freedom, hold as our ideal the prayer of "Bobby" Burns:

> Then let us pray that come it may,
> As come it will for a' that,
> That sense and worth o'er all the earth
> May bear the gree and a' that.
> For a' that and a' that,
> It's coming yet for a' that,
> When man to man the warld o'er
> Shall brothers be for a' that.

[Applause.]

A few days ago the President of the United States sent to this House a special message, dealing with equal enforcement of the law and with the rights of the common masses of the country. He said, in substance, that the just business interests of the country must be protected, but that the unfair encroachments of predatory wealth must be met and stopped by the strong right arm of the law. This side of the House gave unstinted applause to these utterances of the Chief Executive, because we recognized in them the spirit of democracy, the vital breath of the things for which the Democratic party has always stood. We join hands with him in these sentiments and believe with all our hearts that they are right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In our system of government the individual States have supreme power over their own internal affairs, and it should be the function of the Federal Government to protect and safeguard them and their people within the scope of their rights. Among these matters over which the States have jurisdiction is the fixing of rates that shall be charged by railroad and other transportation companies. To assist the States in their legal right to fix such charges and to assist in securing to the people the rights bestowed upon them by State enactment, I have introduced into this session of Congress a bill to amend the interstate-commerce act in the matter of railroad and other transportation rates, which I wish to incorporate into these remarks.

> A bill (H. R. 11732) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof.
> Be it enacted, etc., That two new sections be added to said act, at the end thereof, to be numbered as sections 25 and 26, as follows:
> "SEC. 25. That no common carrier, railroad, or transportation company, subject to the provisions of this act, receiving property for transportation from a point in one State to a point in another State, or conveying passengers from a point in one State to a point in another State, shall charge a greater rate for the transportation of such property or passengers than the sum of the local rates for such property or passengers between said points.
> "SEC. 26. That any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company, subject to the provisions of this act, violating the provisions of the above section shall be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 for each offense. And any officer, agent, or employee of such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company, collecting, or offering to collect, a rate higher than the rates defined in the above section, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000 for each separate offense, or shall be imprisoned for a term of not less than six months nor more than twelve months for each separate offense, or shall be both fined and imprisoned, in the discretion of the court. And the charge on each shipment of freight, and for each passenger, that shall be in excess of the rates defined in the above section, shall be considered a separate offense."

It will be seen that this bill does not seek to create any new rates; it only seeks to protect existing rates as they have been made by the various States through their legislatures. If two contiguous States have enacted laws providing for the same rates, and freight is to be shipped or passengers conveyed from a point in one of these States to a point in the other, it does not seem just to me that a higher rate should be charged simply because such a passenger or such freight is conveyed across a State line. I have, therefore, provided in this bill that upon such shipment of freight or the conveyance of passengers the sum of the local rates only shall be charged by railroad or transportation companies. It must be remembered that this bill does not seek to create any new rates. It seeks only to prevent transportation companies from exceeding those rates that have already been fixed by the various States, through their properly constituted legislative bodies. I believe that the bill is just, that it merely secures the rights of passengers and the shippers of freight, while at the same time it is not unfair to the transportation companies. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this bill should become a law. There is no desire to work discrimination or injustice to the railroad companies. Their value is fully recognized; the rights of capital in general are realized; but, at the same time, so has the shipper of freight and the passenger rights that must be safeguarded by law. This bill does not raise the question of whether or not the rates enacted by the various State legislatures are or are not equitable.

But whenever States have enacted railroad rates, as they have the legal power to do, then in interstate traffic the fair rate to be charged, it seems to me, should be found by computing the sum of the local rates as existing between the point of departure and the point of destination. Let us take an example to illustrate the meaning of this bill: Suppose a passenger desires to travel by rail from a point in Illinois 10 miles west of the eastern boundary of the State to a point in Indiana 10 miles east of the western boundary thereof. Each of these States has a 2-cent fare law. If this ride were to be wholly either in Illinois or in Indiana, his ticket would cost 2 cents per mile, or 40 cents. The conditions of railroading in Illinois are not essentially different from those that prevail in Indiana, but as the law now stands, merely because a State line intervenes, railroad companies could charge 3 cents a mile, or 60 cents, for a ride that they only get 40 cents for if the same be wholly in a State. If the railroad companies can afford to convey passengers within the State of Indiana or Illinois for 2 cents per mile they can also afford to convey passengers from one State to the other, across the State line, at the same rate. The same reasoning applies also to the shipment of freight and to interstate passenger and freight traffic in all the States in general.

Our Republican friends have very forcefully demonstrated to us how a panic can come in times of prosperity, with an overwhelming Republican majority in this House, a Republican Senate, and a Republican President, in the full blush and bloom of Republican policies. They have shown us how, like a bolt out of the blue, hard times can come and close the avenues of employment, put out the fires of industry, and check the wheels of commercial prosperity; they have shown us how in times like these, in an era of profound peace, bonds must be quickly issued to restore public confidence, and even money itself must be bought in the open market. The employers of labor told us in the compaigns of 1896 and 1900 that the election of Bryan meant business depression. They said the election of the Republican ticket would result in an era of universal prosperity. This prediction has not worked out as they said it would. We are at the threshold of another Presidential election. As a greater than I once said:

> You can fool all the people a part of the time, a part of the people all the time, but you can not fool all the people all the time.

[Applause.]

The people of this country, the farmer, the miner, the toiler everywhere, the ones who make this nation great and prosperous, the producers of its wealth and the perpetuators of its greatness, are going to have their day in court, and when the verdict of the jury shall be read in the open court of the Republic, after the Presidential election next November, it will be found that there has been elected to the great office of President of the United States a man who stands for the great toiling masses of the nation, a man who believes in the rights of the people, and who has an abiding faith in the fundamental principle of our National Government, the legal equality of all men before the law. I refer to the greatest commoner of modern times—William J. Bryan. [Loud applause.]

Mr. NYE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON].

The CHAIRMAN. For how long?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Until the committee shall rise.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I made a resolve long since that I would never allow a Congress of which I happened to be a Member to hide itself in the mysterious realms of the past without having urged the passage of the bill which I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas sends to the Clerk's desk a bill which he asks to be read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill will be read in the time of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 189) to prohibit the receipt, delivery, or transmission of interstate or foreign messages, or other information to be used in connection with or furtherance of any project or transaction concerning the interstate or foreign buying or selling or otherwise dealing in futures in agricultural products or commodities, and to prohibit the interstate or foreign buying or selling or otherwise dealing in futures in said products and commodities.

Be it enacted, etc., That the term "dealing in futures" as used in this act shall include all transactions which in anywise depend upon margins as a basis of settlement or which do not in good faith contemplate the actual delivery by the seller to the buyer of the thing or things represented or contracted to be sold, and the failure of the seller to make actual delivery to the buyer of, or the failure of the buyer to in good faith make legal demand of the seller for the thing or things represented or contracted to be sold shall be sufficient proof to establish the character of the transaction.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any telegraph or telephone company, corporation, organization, or association, or any other company, corporation, organization, or association, or any person or persons within the jurisdiction of the United States of America to receive, deliver, transmit, or convey any interstate or foreign message or other information of any character or description to be used in any manner connected with or in furtherance of any project or transaction concerning or pertaining to the interstate or foreign buying or selling or otherwise dealing in futures in agricultural products or commodities of any quantity or description. Any telegraph or telephone company, corporation, organization, or association or any other company, corporation, organization, or association violating any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor for each and every violation of the same, and, upon conviction, shall pay to the United States a penalty of not less than $5,000 for each offense, and any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a felony for each and every violation thereof, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 and imprisonment in the penitentiary for some period of time not less than one year.

SEC. 3. That interstate or foreign buying or selling or otherwise dealing in futures in agricultural products or commodities of any kind whatsoever is hereby declared to be unlawful. Whoever shall so engage in buying or selling or otherwise dealing in futures in agricultural products or commodities in the United States of America shall be guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction, shall be fined in any sum not less than $1,000 and imprisoned in the penitentiary for some period of time not less than one year.

SEC. 4. That no letter, postal card, circular, newspaper, pamphlet, or writing or publication of any other kind containing money or any other representative of value or information of any character to be used in any manner connected with or in furtherance of any project or transaction concerning or pertaining to the interstate or foreign buying or selling or otherwise dealing in futures in agricultural products or commodities shall be carried in the mail or delivered at or through any post-office or branch thereof or by any letter carrier or other postal agent or authority. Whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited or who shall knowingly send or cause to be sent anything to be conveyed or delivered in violation of this section, or who shall knowingly deliver or cause to be delivered by mail anything herein forbidden to be carried by mail shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 and by imprisonment for not less than six months.

SEC. 5. That the judges of the district courts of the United States are hereby directed to give this act in charge to the grand jury at each sitting of the court, and the evidence of either party to a transaction prohibited herein shall be deemed to be sufficient proof to warrant an indictment and sustain a conviction hereunder.

SEC. 6. That all laws in conflict with this act be, and they are hereby, repealed.

[Applause.]

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, this bill is in the interest of the bread makers of the world, and its passage would be of more material worth to the American people than all the political measures that could be crowded through this House during the entire Sixtieth Congress. I have no patience with legislation that rests entirely upon political whims and prejudices, and hence I am in a sense intolerant as to measures and arguments presented by Members of the House which have politics as their foundation; politics as the chief corner stone of the structure.

I enjoyed the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE] as well as the one by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER]. They were nonpolitical, but spoke the simple truth that ought to be sincerely considered by everyone who heard them or shall read them. Such speeches will do more good here than a thousand political speeches, for political speeches only breed passion and can never have the happy, wholesome effect that utterances upon this floor ought to have upon the membership of this body. I regretted very much to hear the gentleman from one of the great States of the West, from the city in which the Democratic convention will convene in June for the purpose of nominating the next President of the United States, engage in a partisan speech, for he is a man that is ordinarily possessed of good judgment and ought to have known that his political remarks would not accomplish anything here. A man who can not rise above partisan politics when it comes to enacting laws for all the people, regardless of their religious creed or political faith, is not large enough to represent 191,000 freeborn American citizens. [Applause.]

The sooner we learn that partisan speeches ought to be made upon "the stump" instead of upon the floor of the greatest legislative body on earth, the better off will we be, and the better off will be the noble constituency that we have the honor of representing. It has been said during the debate of this bill by Members upon the other side of the House that we upon this side are not consistent in our attitude toward the President of the United States; that we applauded a sentiment that condemns him, and at the next moment applauded a sentiment in his favor. While I do not propose to dwell upon the subject and thereby attempt to answer such arguments at length, I will state that members of the party that I represent are broad enough, honest enough, and intelligent enough to recognize and appreciate right thinking and correct utterances, no matter when or by whom thought or uttered. Therefore if the President of the United States is so constituted as that he can say something good in a message delivered to this body, or upon the hustings, it makes no difference whether he be a Democrat or Republican, we ought to be allowed to applaud him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Upon the other hand, Mr. Chairman, if that same President, whether a Democrat or a Republican, utters or writes a thing that we believe to be detrimental to the best interests of our country, we ought to be allowed to condemn his course by applauding those who criticise his actions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Hence, Mr, Chairman, I can see no sense or reason for bringing politics into the discussions upon the floor of the House, when we know that every Member of it is a free agent, and has a perfect right to think and act as he pleases upon political questions, and is not bound by anything that is said here, and is not answerable for anything that he does or says, except to those who sent him here to represent them. [Applause.]

We ought to do our level best to legislate along business lines, and when we enact laws such as is set forth in the bill that I have just had read, we are proceeding along business lines of the highest sense, for the farmers' interest is the greatest business interest that has ever, or will ever, confront a civilized people.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas did not introduce this bill in this Congress for the first time, did he? As well as I remember, he introduced it in the Fifty-ninth Congress, and I would like to know if that is not a fact?

Mr. MACON. Yes, sir; I introduced it in the Fifty-ninth Congress and made a speech in its behalf at that time, which was sent broadcast over the country through the medium of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I received many telegrams and letters commending the measure, as well as the feeble utterances that I put forth in support of it, some of which came from such important sources and are of such significance as to call for their incorporation in my remarks at this time, and I will now submit them.

The first of which will disclose the practice pursued by "bucket-shop" gamblers, that my bill seeks to exterminate, and suggests the havoc that is, or will be wrought by them to the people of the great grain-growing section, as well as the cotton-growing section, of our country, if some measure similar to mine is not passed by the Congress of the United States that will cause them to halt where they are. This letter is from Mr. W. H. Avery, of Eldorado, Kans., in which was inclosed one to W. S. Avery from a firm of "bucket shop" operators in Chicago, who signed themselves J. K. Comstock & Co. I now present them both in order that they may explain themselves, and in order that all persons who happen to read them may know the practices of the "future" gamblers of the country and will be fortified to resist their temptations, just as the Christian ought to be fortified to enable him to resist the wiles and temptations of the devil. [Applause.]

Hon. Mr. MACON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I notice that you have introduced a bill to do away with "bucket shops." I inclose a letter from one of these concerns. Such letters are received about twice each month, and are usually sent to young men working on salary, and this man has in some instances gotten all their wages. I hope your bill will become a law at this session of Congress.

Very respectfully, W. H. AVERY.

CHICAGO, December 3, 1906.

Mr. W. S. AVERY, Eldorado, Kans.

DEAR SIR: There is certainly going to be something "doing" in this wheat market, and it may be this coming week, and if you will only take a risk of $6.25 or $12.50 you will stand an excellent chance of getting 5,000 or 10,000 bushels of wheat for this small amount of money. On Friday, December 7, you can buy ups on May wheat 1¼ cents away from the closing price of market on that day for eight days and 2¼ cents away for fifteen days, and if the advance comes as we expect it will be for 4 or 5 cents, and you can figure your profit as well as we can. Each 1 cent advance above your up price means $50 profit for each $6.25 invested.

Wheat is cheap, and here is your opportunity. If market closes lower than 79 cents on Friday, so much the better for you and your purchase. If above 79 cents, it shows advance has started sooner than we expected. Everything is in your favor.

Don't delay. Send order by return mail so we can book it. If far away "wire it" at our expense and let funds follow by first mail. Orders mailed Friday, December 7, accepted. Six dollars and twenty-five cents buys five ups on 5,000 bushels for seven or fifteen days; $12.50 buys five ups on 10,000 bushels for seven or fifteen days.

Very truly, yours,

J. K. COMSTOCK & Co.

The reading of Mr. Avery's letter indicates that these "bucket-shop" gamblers are peculiarly anxious to catch the young and unsophisticated citizens of our country, and the reading of the Comstock letter indicates that they want to catch them quick. They do not seem to be willing to wait to have them send in their orders by mail, but are encouraged to wire them in at the expense of the gamblers. I suppose their reason for that is that they fear that those who are contemplating placing their orders might have time to think while writing a letter, and decide not to engage in the nefarious "future dealing" business.

I have incorporated the Avery and Comstock letters in my remarks for the purpose of showing that the people of the country are being filched out of their hard earnings by these unscrupulous speculators in every quarter of it, and to show the wily, seductive practices resorted to by these "bucket-shop" satellites to impale the innocent members of society upon "the barbed hook with which they fish for suckers."

One would judge from reading the Comstock letter that that concern is engaged in the buying and selling of grain and provisions along legitimate lines, but a glance at the right-hand corner of the page on which is printed "ups and downs a specialty" readily discloses to an experienced business man that they are conducting an illegitimate business. Mr. Avery insists that the Comstock communications are nearly always sent to young men who are working on salaries, and they, being without experience, do not comprehend that they are falling into the hands of speculative sharks, and hence are robbed of the fruits of their toil before they know it.

These "bucket-shop" concerns seem to send out their invitations to the young men of the country about twice a month in which they employ most optimistic language in their efforts to encourage them to take stock in their very questionable business, and they are urged to be quick about it, to write at once, and if they are far away to wire at the expense of the faking concern. An idea of the infamy and danger of the business engaged in by Comstock & Co. will be readily understood by all sane persons the moment they read the first clause of their letter. Here it is:

DEAR SIRS: There is certainly going to be something "doing" in this wheat market, and it may be this coming week, and if you will only take a risk of $6.25 or $12.50, you stand an excellent chance of getting 5,000 to 10,000 bushels of wheat for this small amount of money.

Mr. Chairman, a man of half sense can see that the hand of a robber penned that letter, for wheat is worth about a dollar a bushel, and when it is said that if one were to put up $6.25 and were to get $5,000 worth of wheat in return therefor, it suggests nothing more nor less than that some one, somewhere, and in some way must necessarily be robbed of $4,993.75 in order for the man who puts up the $6.25 to receive that great sum upon so small an investment.

I can not conceive of a more reprehensible business than that of attempting to control the price of the products of the toiling masses of the country by speculative practices at the expense of pilfering the pockets and debauching the characters of the splendid young men of this country. They are taught the gambling habit at the expense of the impoverishment of themselves and their families.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Your bill has never been reported, has it?

Mr. MACON. It has not, but I understand from many Members of the House that it is the best bill of the kind that was ever presented to this body, and that it is contemplated that it will be reported to the House at this session of Congress, but not in my name, it being intended to report it in the name of a Member of the majority party, so that that party will have the credit for the important legislation. That fact, however, does not concern me, for I have never yet been so narrow as to want to have important legislation enacted in order that I might have the credit therefor. Results are what I want in behalf of this and every other great question, and it makes no material difference with me whether measures bear the name of MACON, HEPBURN, or SCOTT, if they only accomplish the purposes that are intended to be reached. [Applause.]

In addition to having urged this measure in a speech in the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, I attempted to have it incorporated in the agricultural appropriation bill of the last session of that Congress, and have insisted at all times that it was a question far and above politics, and far and above any name that might be connected with it. [Applause.]

I now offer a few other indorsements of this bill, which were spread upon the RECORD in connection with the proceedings had on the 26th day of January, 1907, when I offered it as an amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill, and in order that the public may have the full benefit of what was done and said at that time, as well as to show the technical tactics employed in this House when it comes to legislating in behalf of the farmers, I will also incorporate what was said upon the subject by the chairman of the Agricultural Committee and myself, thus presenting the matter in a connected form. I will omit setting out at this time the amendment that I offered to the agricultural bill, it being the same as the bill I am now addressing myself to:

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Insert after the enacting clause the following:"

Mr. WADSWORTH. I raise the point of order on that, Mr. Chairman. It is not germane, and it is new legislation.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman to be courteous enough to withhold his point of order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think we have passed a good deal of time in general debate, and this is not germane to the bill, and I can not withdraw it. I would like to accommodate the gentleman.

Mr. MACON. It is not fair for you to try to bring this bill up, with new matter in it, and yet deny me the right to be heard on the floor on an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I offer, and to which the gentleman from New York seems to seriously object, is certainly germane to the matter before the House for consideration. The agricultural appropriation bill is supposed to deal with agricultural matters exclusively, and my amendment is in the interest of agriculture in the highest sense, and I can not understand how anyone could get his consent to make a point of order against it. The gentleman claims that it is new legislation, and hence objectionable under the rules of the House. I think he must object to it upon other grounds than that, for there are many new pieces of legislation embodied in this very bill that he as chairman of the committee presented to and is now attempting to conduct through the House just as he presented it. Certainly this amendment is no more offensive to the rules of the House than is the new legislation that he has in the bill to increase salaries. I notice that one of the arguments used by the gentleman in his report sustaining the committee's action in taking the free garden seed from the farmers is that the agricultural organizations of the country were against the proposition. I do not believe that is true, but if it is true and is good argument upon which to take free seed from the farmers, then I desire to offer the approval and indorsement of my amendment by the farmers' organizations of the country as a reason why it should be allowed to become a part of this bill.

I have received telegrams, letters, petitions, and resolutions from farmers and farmers' organizations from all over the Union urging the kind of legislation set forth in my amendment. In fact, the amendment is taken from a bill that I introduced in the House at a former day of this session, which called forth the indorsements just mentioned. If the gentleman can show more agricultural indorsements of his action of striking down the farmers' seed than I can show indorsing my course in introducing the bill that I now offer as an amendment to the pending bill, I will not complain of the point of order that he makes against it; but I insist that if it is the farmers he is trying to benefit and please he will withdraw his point of order, for I have here on my desk a telegram informing me that the national convention of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, a farmers' organization representing more than a million tillers of the soil, assembled at Atlanta, Ga., on the 24th instant, had unanimously indorsed my bill to prohibit dealing in futures in agricultural products, and had extended me a vote of thanks for having introduced it. I also have a resolution adopted by the Southern Cotton Growers' Association of the State of Mississippi unanimously indorsing it, and many other resolutions adopted by county and local agricultural organizations indorsing it.

Yet, sir, when I present the measure here for the consideration of the Representatives of these people who support the world the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture rises in his place and throttles their efforts to carry out the will of the people who sent them here by interposing the technical parliamentary obstruction of a point of order.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, is it possible that the gentleman will interpose so flimsy an obstruction to prevent the people's Representatives from voting upon a proposition that means so much to them? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask to be allowed to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating as a part of my remarks the telegram and a few of the resolutions to which I have referred. I will only burden the RECORD with a few of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The following is the matter referred to:

"ATLANTA, GA., January 24, 1907.

"Read and adopted this 5th day of January, 1907.

"I. D. WALTER, Secretary."

The CHAIRMAN. The matter included in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas is clearly new legislation and the point of order is sustained.

It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that one of the above indorsements was the act of the national convention of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, one of the greatest and most patriotic organizations on the face of the earth to-day. Another of said indorsements represents the act of the Mississippi Division of the Southern Cotton Growers' Association, another splendid organization, made up of the same kind of worthy material that constitutes the membership of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union; and the third is the act of a county union that is as important a part of the national organization as any other part that goes to make up the grand whole. To receive the thanks of these splendid organizations is enough glory for me in connection with the passage of this bill. Therefore, I renew the sentiment uttered a few moments ago and say that I will applaud the passage of the measure in the name of some one else. The result will be the same, if the measure passes, though it bear the name of a Republican, that it would be if it bore that of a Democrat; and results are all any patriotic citizen ought to want in connection with any species of legislation.

A Congressman who would advocate legislation simply because it was presented by a member of his party, and oppose it because presented by a member of the opposing party is as much too small to stay here, as a candidate who will urge sectionalism as a reason for his election to Congress, is too small to come here. The Congressman nor the candidate will not resort to such sorry tactics to accomplish their end, unless they are so weak and inferior themselves that they feel that partisanship and sectionalism must be used as a substitute for sense and patriotism, two things that are highly necessary in the make-up of a Representative of the people, and of which they are destitute. [Applause.]

Congress ought to legislate on broad-gauge business principles and for the best interest of all the interests of our country, and hence I present this bill to-day for its consideration, because I believe it to be in the interest of the most important of all the interests of our country, the farmer. [Applause.]

I am opposed to class legislation, and do not think we ought to attempt to divide the American people into classes, but that we ought to consider them in matters of legislation as occupying planes of actual equality, but if they are ever to be divided into classes, then the most important class ought to be considered first, and all persons know that the farming class is the most important of all, and yet every one knows that they are the last people to be considered when it comes to matters of legislation. When has the farming interest of the country been given the same consideration by national or State legislatures that has been given to railroads and other interests of the country? And yet, the farming interest in the United States at this time represents in round numbers about $30,000,000,000 in value, while the railroads represent a little more than $13,000,000,000 in value.

The money question has agitated the country from time to time to the extent of dividing parties, as well as homes, in twain, and yet the farming interest in the United States represents about ten times as much in value as all of the money of every kind in circulation in the United States at this time. And, sir, our principal farm products for the last fiscal year were worth $3,500,000,000, and I do not include in that estimate the dairy and horticultural interests of the country, which are practically a part of the products of the farm. The farmers of the country keep the balance of the trade with the rest of the world in our favor by the exportation of their products, cotton being greatly in the lead of all other exports.

Notwithstanding the great interest that the farmers represent, I would like for some one to tell me when they have been given any considerable thought in the matter of legislation. They more than any other class pay the high tariff that is imposed upon us, and they get none of the benefits that accrue therefrom, and hence they were not considered in the enactment of that law. Nor do I believe anyone can point to a single piece of legislation that has been enacted in fifty long years that placed the farmers first in any of its provisions.

They have, through their national organization, asked for the passage of this very character of legislation that I now urge, for many years, and yet their importunity has gone unheard, certainly unheeded. Their resolutions have been treated like they were so much chaff, not worthy of the consideration of a man who thought he was large enough to represent a district in Congress or a county in a State legislature.

The farmer is not even allowed to control the price of the product of his toil. The law permits "bucket-shop" gamblers to fix the prices for him, and we know that in fixing them they often bring havoc to the farming communities. Their wildcat speculations demand all of the money of the country to carry on their illegitimate business, and hence when the farmer has his product ready for the market he finds all of the money tied up in speculative transactions, and that there is none left to buy his products with.

The present panic, in my judgment, was brought on by wild speculations, such as dealing in "futures" in agricultural products, and in stocks and bonds, when there was no intention on the part of either party to any speculative contract that was entered into to ever carry out a single one of them in good faith, and when there was no intention to ever deliver or receive a single one of the many millions of bales of cotton that were sold that were never raised, or the many billions of bushels of corn or wheat and pounds of meat that were never produced, nor a single stock nor bond that was sold.

Last year the farmers of the South agreed to hold their cotton for 15 cents per pound, and they would have received that price for every pound of it, had not the "bucket-shop" gamblers consumed the money of the country by their wild trading in "futures" in stocks and bonds. And, sir, if they are permitted to pursue the course that they have heretofore pursued, we may expect panic after panic to overtake us, and there will be no way of reckoning as to when they will put in their appearance.

This bill, if enacted into law, will do away with their illegitimate transactions in so far as they affect the sales of agricultural products, and will allow the farmers to enjoy a real substantial prosperity, such as alone can be produced by the God-given law of supply and demand. They can then say that they demand so much per pound for their cotton and meat, so much per bushel for their corn and wheat, and they can get it, because the money will be in the country to buy what they raise, instead of being tied up in speculative transactions.

It will in no way affect legitimate sales for future delivery where such sales are entered into in good faith. Therefore, no one who wants to engage in legitimate trade can possibly fear any evil results coming to his business by reason of the enactment of such law.

The question of dealing in "futures" in agricultural products, stocks, and bonds has become so serious that the President of the United States has seen fit to incorporate it in a special message that he recently sent to Congress, in which he, among other things, said:

> There should be measures taken to prevent, at least, the grosser forms of gambling in securities and commodities, such as making large sales of what men do not possess and cornering the market. Illegitimate purchases of commodities and of stocks and securities for investment have no connection whatever with purchases of other securities or commodities on a margin for speculative and gambling purposes. There is no moral difference between gambling at cards, or lottery, or on the race track and gambling in the stock market. One method is just as pernicious to the body politic as the other. In kind and in degree the evil worked is far greater.

Again, he says in his message:

> That the great bulk of the business transacted on the exchanges is not only legitimate, but is necessary to the working of our modern industrial system, and extreme care would have to be taken not to interfere with this business, in doing away with the "bucket-shop" type of operation.

My bill only seeks to destroy the "bucket-shop" type of operation, and will not in any sense interfere with any legitimate trade of any kind.

Again, the President says:

> It would seem that the Federal Government could at least act by forbidding the use of the mails, telegraph and telephone wires for mere gambling in stocks and "futures," just as in lottery transactions.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, if enacted into law, will do just what the President recommends the Federal Government to do. While this particular bill would only stop that part of the "bucket-shop" business that applies to dealing in "futures" in agricultural products, I have a bill pending in this body that will do the very same thing for illegitimate stock and bond transactions. That bill is numbered 10474, and was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, over which the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] so ably presides, on the 19th day of last December, but I am frank to confess that I am not as much interested in preventing illegitimate stock and bond transactions as I am those that affect the price of the products of the toiling masses of the country. This illegitimate business ought to be stopped, for in the language of Mr. Bryan, "The commandment 'Thou shalt not steal' is violated in the stock market and in the grain pit by those who profess to believe in the Bible."

The stock exchanges of this country are aggressive and unscrupulous, and no power, other than the National Government, can cope with them. No matter how great the burden they impose, how grievous the wrong done, no State can properly deal with them, because the States can not go beyond their boundaries to exercise the sovereign right to protect their citizens from tyranny and injustice. Even within their own boundaries the States are seriously handicapped by the constitutional limitations respecting State and interstate commerce. Therefore, it is necessary that the National Government should step in and prevent "bucket-shop" transactions, and unless it does there is no way on earth to stop the practice.

Any kind of a transaction that will make a bale of cotton worth $10 more or $10 less than it was at a different time and hour on the same day, is wrong and exceedingly dangerous to the prosperity of every community in which it is grown or handled. It can not be legitimate and ought not to be tolerated any more than any other illegitimate happening, no matter of what character or description. Let's pass this bill, gentlemen, and stop the infamous practice of dealing in "futures" in agricultural products. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACON. Of course.

Mr. GARRETT The gentleman is a member, is he not, of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws?

Mr. MACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARRETT. I want to ask the gentleman if he has heard the rumor that the codification bill, which is now within two sections of an amendment upon the line of the gentleman's bill, notice of which was given some days ago, is not to be before this House any more? Has the gentleman heard that rumor?

Mr. MACON. I have not, sir; notwithstanding I am a member of the committee I have not heard the rumor.

Mr. GARRETT. I desire to inform the gentleman that that is not only a rumor, but, if I understand, it is an absolute fact, and that amendment in line with the bill of the gentleman is pending with notice given that it was to be introduced, and immediately after that notice was given the bill was withdrawn from the consideration of this House.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding what the gentleman from Tennessee says, I can not believe that the membership of this body can possibly be so hostile to this character of legislation as that it would refuse to proceed with the consideration of the codification code of our criminal law just because it would have to consider an amendment dealing with the "bucket-shop" business. I am sure the gentleman has heard what he says, but I can't help but think that his informant was somewhat in error.

Mr. Chairman, I might proceed to discuss this question for hours, for there is much to be said in its favor and nothing of a legitimate character to be said against it, but time will not permit me to do so; so I will conclude by saying, as I have been pleased to say time and time again, that it is known of all men that the farmers sustain the world, and that they have done so since its creation. Therefore, if any class of people on earth are entitled to recognition by way of legislation, they are entitled to it.

Without the fruits of the farmers' toil lawyers, doctors, bankers, merchants, mechanics, miners, and office holders would have to go to tilling the soil, or else become cannibals, feasting upon their fellows, or wild men, living upon herbs and berries, or be driven to their graves in a short period of time by the pangs of starvation. In addition to producing every morsel of food that sustains human life, they produce the product that furnishes every rag of apparel that shelters mankind from the freezing blasts of winter's storms, or the scorching rays of a burning sun. In addition to feeding and clothing the world he has maintained its independence during all of its stages of progress and development. He fought the battles that won for us the independence that we now enjoy. It was the farmers that drove Packingham into the sea at New Orleans, and it was the farmers that won for us the splendid western territory out of which was carved the queen of all our southwestern States, and it was the farmers in the struggle between the States, the most momentous war of all the ages, that established a degree of courage and chivalry that surpasses that of the warriors of any other country on earth.

The farmer having done so much for the world, Mr. Chairman, let us do something for him by passing this bill. He has asked us to do so; he wants it, and by every reason of right and justice he ought to have it. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PERKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15219, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to further modify the order made on Friday and modified this morning, so as to provide for four hours general debate to-morrow, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Texas and myself, the division to be made so that with what we have already occupied, the gentleman from Texas having occupied a little more time than we have, that when completed it will be equal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

AMERICAN LIVE STOCK ASSOCIATION,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Denver, Colo., February 1, 1908.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor of inclosing herewith duly certified copies of the following resolutions:

Resolution No. 1, relative to furnishing cars for the transportation of live stock and other perishable freight, which indorses Senate bill No. 3644 introduced by you.

Resolution No. 2, opposing advances in interstate rates, fares, and charges except on approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Resolution No. 8, regulating the speed limit of live stock trains.

I am directed by our executive committee to ask you to have these resolutions read in the Senate and referred to the proper committees.

Yours, respectfully,

T. W. TOMLINSON, Secretary.

AMERICAN NATIONAL LIVE STOCK ASSOCIATION.

[Adopted at Denver, Colo., January 21 and 22, 1908.]

Resolution No. 1, relative to furnishing cars to transport live stock and other perishable freight and to give prompt and efficient service.

Whereas many of the railroads have failed to supply themselves with sufficient facilities to perform their duties as common carriers in receiving and transporting freight throughout the western half of the United States, where live-stock raising and feeding and shipping is a most extensive and important industry, and have failed to furnish cars in which live stock could be shipped to market to such an extent that tens of thousands of cattle and sheep could not during the past season be marketed, and have failed to supply cars for such great length of time after orders have been given therefor that a large proportion of the live stock marketed were so much delayed—generally for weeks and in many instances for months—that they lost seriously in flesh and condition, and after cars were supplied and live stock loaded have moved the same at such slow rate of speed and otherwise delayed shipments as to seriously damage such live stock; and

Whereas this treatment of the live-stock industry of the country has been growing worse year by year and has cost the producers millions of dollars, reaching the appalling condition during the past season of forcing many shippers practically out of business, probably bankrupting some and seriously injuring and demoralizing the entire live-stock business, particularly in the Southwest; and

Whereas there are, as a whole, more stock cars and have been fewer shipments the past season than heretofore, and it is our belief, from observation, experience, and from what we can ascertain, that there has been a reckless indifference of the railroad management in the localities where this disastrous condition has existed in supplying themselves with stock cars or in utilizing what they have been able to obtain to transport live stock, either permitting the cars to stand idle, as has often been the case, or using them in transporting other traffic at a time when live stock was being held for shipment and fast depreciating in value, thereby producing a wanton destruction of property; and

Whereas there exists no adequate means of compelling the railroads to perform their duty to furnish cars and perform the transportation service in reasonable time, if at all, and no means of securing adequate redress for failure of the railroads to perform those duties where they fail to do so; and

Whereas there is no way by which one railroad can compel its connections to exchange empty cars for loaded cars of live stock or to receive and forward live stock in the cars in which they are loaded; and

Whereas the refusal of railroads to permit cars to go off their own line and to deliver cars to other lines has to a great extent impaired the efficiency of the cars which should be available and placed it beyond the power of many railroads to secure cars or a return of cars or exchange of cars, and in this way demoralized the railroad service; and

Whereas it is our earnest belief, concurred in by all those who investigate the subject, that the free exchange of cars and the through and rapid transportation of live stock is the only way in which this unbearable condition can be relieved; and

Whereas we believe that if left to themselves the railroads will not better conditions, at least not relieve them, in absence of some law which compels a free exchange and interchange of cars to enable each road to get back empty cars for loaded cars delivered to its connections and a law which fixes penalties to compel the furnishing of cars to shippers and the exchange and interchange as between railroads; and

Whereas there has been introduced in the Senate of the United States by the Hon. C. A. CULBERSON, United States Senator from Texas, a bill, numbered S. 3044, declaring it to be the duty of railroads, subject to the act to regulate commerce, to provide sufficient facilities to perform with dispatch their duties as common carriers in furnishing cars and transporting all freight, including live stock, and to promptly transport same and to exchange loaded and empty cars and otherwise to provide sufficient facilities, fixing penalties for failure of such duties and giving to the shipper the right to recover in any court of any State or Territory having jurisdiction his damages and attorney's fees, and in case of failure to furnish cars for shipping live stock double the damages sustained, and also empowering the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce penalties for violation of the act and to make rules and regulations with respect to the time and manner of giving notice for cars, furnishing cars, exchange and interchange of cars, and all needful rules and regulations in the administration of such law and to compel its observance and providing rules applicable to the different classes and kind of freight and the varying circumstances and conditions of shipment; and

Whereas we believe that the enactment of said bill into law will speedily remedy the deplorable conditions herein set forth and that some such measure is imperatively necessary: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American National Live Stock Association, in convention assembled in Denver, Colo., January 21 and 22, 1908, That we heartily indorse said bill and recommend to our Senators and Congressmen from all of the Western States from which this association draws it membership that the same be passed; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be promptly printed and sent to each of the Western Senators and Congressmen, with the request that the same be read in both the Senate and the House of Representatives as the expression of this convention; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy thereof be sent to President Roosevelt as the expression of this convention, with the request he submit to Congress a special message urging an enactment of such a law; and be it further

Resolved, That said bill be printed by the secretary of this association and furnished the members thereof, with the request that they write their respective Senators and Members of Congress urging the enactment thereof.

Be it resolved by the American National Live Stock Association, in annual convention assembled in Denver, Colo., January 21 and 22, 1908, That the Congress of the United States be, and the same is hereby, memorialized to enact a law which shall prohibit any railroad company from advancing interstate rates, fares, and charges, except upon approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission after notice thereof to interested parties in such cases as the Commission shall deem necessary; and

That all parties having the right under present laws to complain of unlawful rates shall have the right to complain of any proposed advance in the rates, whereupon it shall be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend the taking effect of such proposed advances until an opportunity shall be afforded the interested party to be heard; and

That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be authorized to suspend in all cases any changes in the tariffs covering rates, fares, and charges, or rules and regulations respecting the same, pending any investigation which the Commission deem necessary to determine whether the same is just and reasonable.

Committee resolution No. 8, regulating speed limit of live-stock trains.

Be it resolved by the American National Live Stock Association in annual convention assembled in Denver, Colo., January 21 and 22, 1908, That the Congress of the United States be, and the same is hereby, memorialized to enact a law to provide for a minimum speed limit for the transportation of live stock, which minimum speed limit for stock trains shall not be less than 20 miles per hour from the place of loading to the first division point of the road, and between division points and the place of destination, with such exceptions as should be made over mountain divisions and under other exceptional cases, as to make the same reasonable, as circumstances may require; and

That the time limit for stoppage of live stock at division points does not exceed a reasonable time. That the law fix appropriate penalties against railroad companies for failing to observe such speed limit in the transportation of live stock, and for failure to observe such rules as may be prescribed by the Commission, subject to such exceptions as are fair and reasonable for accidents and causes beyond the reasonable foresight and control of such railroad companies; Provided, That the burden shall be on the railroad company to show in all such cases the facts of such accident preventing the observance of said mentioned speed limit; and be it further

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be vested with the power to prescribe the speed limit, so as to make it applicable to the various circumstances and conditions of transportation.

THE PHILLIPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. STONE. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it may be read and lie on the table subject to call.

The joint resolution (S. R. 52) requesting the President, on a day named in the future, to deliver the control and possession of the Philippine Islands to the authorities representing the people thereof, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas by virtue of the treaty between the United States and Spain, December 10, 1898, the United States established its control over the Philippine Islands; and

Whereas as a step toward their ultimate independence there was first established by acts of the Philippine Commission in 1901, and thereafter a scheme of provincial and municipal governments, which governments in the hands of the Filipinos themselves under an elective system have achieved and maintained order and stability; and

Whereas as a further step in the same direction and two years after a proclamation of the complete pacification of the islands, the United States provided for an election of a Philippine assembly, which assembly inaugurated last October is now, as appears from the reports of the Secretary of War, in full and satisfactory operation; and

Whereas the steps heretofore successfully taken have demonstrated and are demonstrating the justice of the claim of the Filipinos for speedy independence and their capacity for self-government; and

Whereas it is frequently urged as a reason for refusing independence to the Philippine Islands, that some other nation would seize the islands if the United States abandoned them; and

Whereas this danger can be removed by an agreement between the United States and the great nations of Europe and Asia whereby the independence of the Philippine Islands shall be assured, and they shall be regarded as neutral territory not open to the occupation of any other nation, as the independence of Switzerland has long been secured in Europe; and

Whereas fidelity to the fundamental principles of the American Government requires that said Government should aim to secure and safeguard the independence of said islands: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is requested on the 10th day of December, 1913, that is to say, fifteen years after the date of the Treaty of Paris, to deliver the control and possession of said islands to the authorities representing the people thereof, including also all government property therein pertaining to the administration of such government, and withdraw therefrom immediately thereafter the Army and Navy of the United States: Provided, however, That the United States shall retain on such date and thereafter such suitable coaling and naval stations as in the judgment of the President may seem necessary, and that the delivery of said islands to such native government shall in itself imply the assumption by it of the obligations then existing and incumbent upon the Government of the United States and consequent upon the granting of any franchise, as well as the assumption of all outstanding obligations of the Government at that time existing in said islands; and be it further

Resolved, That the President is requested to open negotiations with other nations for the purpose of securing an agreement with them for the neutralization of the Philippine Islands and the recognition of their independence whenever the same shall be granted by the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

Resolved, That we enthusiastically indorse the bill introduced by Senator BEVERIDGE providing for a commission of tariff experts, whose duty it shall be to study the tariff in all its varying phases and applications and report to the next Congress. We believe that in this way the true condition of the tariff situation will be disclosed and the needed revisions of the schedules suggested.

MASSACHUSETTS STATE BOARD OF TRADE.

[Resolution adopted January 24, 1908.]

Resolved, That the Massachusetts State Board of Trade, believing that the changes in the tariff should be made in accordance with business requirements, and not because of political considerations, favors legislation by Congress which shall provide for the appointment by the President of a permanent nonpartisan tariff commission, to whom proposed changes in the laws relating to the tariff shall be submitted for consideration and report before being acted upon by Congress.

CHICAGO ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE.

We believe that the appointment of a permanent nonpartisan tariff commission, to make an unbiased investigation and report to Congress, would result in legislation adopting the broad commercial principle of reciprocity.

THE AMERICAN RECIPROCAL TARIFF LEAGUE AND 200 CONSTITUENT ORGANIZATIONS.

[National Reciprocity Conference, Chicago, unanimously adopted August 16–17, 1905.]

Resolved, That eventually the question of schedules and items to be considered in reciprocal concessions preferably be suggested by a permanent tariff commission, to be created by Congress and appointed by the President, which shall consist of economic, industrial, and commercial experts: That we urge upon Congress such action at the earliest time possible.

DECEMBER 9, 1907.

Resolved, That the Baltimore Chamber of Commerce unites with other commercial organizations in urging the enactment of a law which shall create a tariff commission, thus affording ample opportunity to study the tariff thoroughly, in all its bearings, and report a definite and conclusive recommendation by 1909, when such changes in our tariff laws can be considered.

CHATTANOOGA MANUFACTURING ASSOCIATION.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., January, 1908.

We are in favor of an early readjustment of our present tariffs, and of a permanent nonpartisan tariff commission. Also that the same commission be empowered to keep it revised to suit the changing business conditions of our country, so that equal justice may be done to all our people. The question of tariff, as we view it, should be outside of political parties, because it is a question of economics, and not one of policy or preference.

MILLERS' NATIONAL FEDERATION.

CHICAGO, January 24, 1908.

The Millers' National Federation are in favor of a tariff readjustment entirely along the lines of reciprocal arrangements which will enable us to regain certain foreign markets which we are convinced are closed to us due to the lack of reciprocity. Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Portland Chamber of Commerce urges passage S. 3163 to create a tariff commission.

PORTLAND CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I may say for the information of the Senate that these resolutions of these important bodies of American producers of every kind are located in every portion of this country, and as this discussion proceeds others of a similar nature will be produced from every State in the Union.

I send to the desk, and ask that it may be read for the information of the Senate, Senate bill 3163.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the first three sections of the bill (S. 3163) to create a tariff commission, introduced by Mr. BEVERIDGE, January 7, 1908.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will not ask that the reading of the bill shall further proceed. Each Senator has it on his desk. I have had this much of the bill read so that the Senate may now know, as I am about to address it, just what the bill proposes.

Mr. FRYE. The whole bill will be printed?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The whole bill will be printed as a part of my remarks. I thank the Senator from Maine.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (S. 3163) to create a tariff commission.

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created a Commission which shall be known as the tariff commission.

SEC. 2. That said Commission shall consist of seven members, appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice the consent of the Senate, the members of said Commission to be appointed solely with a view to their qualifications as specified in this act and without regard to political affiliations. The composition of the Commission shall be as nearly as possible as follows: First, three members identified with the producing interests; second, one member a lawyer who has made a special study of the customs and tariff laws of the United States; third, one member who has had special experience in connection with the administration of customs and tariff laws of the United States; fourth, one member familiar with industrial and commercial conditions in foreign countries affecting competition of foreign products with products of the United States and thoroughly conversant with the customs and tariff laws of those countries; fifth, one economist and statistician who has given special attention to the subject of prices and cost of production as affecting the tariff. No member shall belong to either branch of Congress. The members of said Commission shall be appointed for terms of seven years, but any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. The Commissioner first named shall be the chairman of the Commission. Each Commissioner shall receive an annual salary of $7,500. The Commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive a salary of $3,600. The Commission shall have the power to employ and fix the compensation of such other employees as it may find necessary to the proper performance of its duties.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said Commission to investigate immediately the cost of production of all articles covered by the tariff, with special reference to the prices paid American labor in comparison with the prices paid foreign labor, the prices of raw materials, whether domestic or imported, entering into manufactured articles, the condition of domestic and foreign markets as affecting American products, and all other facts which, in the judgment of said Commission, may be necessary or helpful to Congress in providing equitable rates of duties on any article; and, in general, to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the manufacturing, agricultural, commercial, and mining interests of the United States so far as the same may be necessary or helpful to Congress in enacting customs tariffs laws.

SEC. 4. That said Commission shall tabulate the results of said investigation and submit the same to Congress, together with an explanatory report of said facts so ascertained; and said tabulation of said facts and report in explanation of the same shall be laid before Congress at the earliest possible moment for the use, information, and guidance of Congress; and at the request of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, or by the direction of Congress by resolution, said Commission shall sit with said above-named committees of the House and of the Senate during the sessions of said committees when said committees are drafting or considering any bill affecting the customs tariff laws of the United States.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of said Commission to study and investigate all rulings and classifications of the Treasury Department by which new articles not specifically provided for in the customs tariff law are now included in the operation of said law; and also make a study of the classifications recently adopted in the customs tariff laws of the leading commercial nations of the world; and to submit to Congress the result of said investigations, together with a draft of a scheme for the scientific classification of tariff schedules.

SEC. 6. That said Commission shall have the power to sit and hold hearings in any part of the country, and it shall be the duty of said Commission, through one or more members thereof, to personally visit every section of the country and personally investigate the conditions of each section with reference to the tariff; it shall also have the power to visit, through one or more of its members or employees, such foreign countries as may be found necessary in the prosecution of its work. Said Commission in pursuing its investigations, as above provided, shall have the power to take testimony, administer oaths, and require the production of books and papers for the purpose of the accurate ascertainment of the facts which it shall be the duty of said Commission to investigate and report to Congress, as hereinbefore provided. The principal offices of said Commission shall be in the city of Washington, and said Commission may hire suitable offices for its use and procure all necessary office supplies. Should said Commission require the attendance of any witness, either in Washington or at any other place not the home of said witness, said witness shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses by the courts of the United States.

All of the expenses of the Commission, including all necessary expenses for transportation incurred by the Commissioners, or by their employees under their orders, in making any investigations, or upon official business in any other places than in Washington, shall be paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers, approved by the chairman of the Commission. The sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated for the salaries and expenses of the Commission authorized by this act.

A TARIFF COMMMISSION TO FIND FACTS AND MAKE CLASSIFICATIONS.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, this bill seeks to create a commission of tariff experts to find out the facts upon which Congress builds a tariff and to make a classification of articles to which Congress can plainly and accurately fix customs duties.

By this bill the commission itself is not allowed to fix duties or even to suggest any rate. By this bill the fixing of duties is left to Congress and to Congress alone. Congress parts with no legislative power.

The commission is kept strictly to the task of gathering facts and making clear classifications; the first is expert investigating work, the second, expert clerical work. Neither is properly legislative work.

In short, by this bill the commission is an assistant of Congress, a servant and clerk of Congress. It is to Congress as a whole what his secretary is to each Member of Congress; it is necessary to Congress for the same reason that the secretary is necessary to each Member.

Personally I am not wedded to this or any other bill. I am determined only upon the idea. If a wiser plan can be thought of than the one which this bill proposes, I shall work and vote for it as heartily as for this plan. But some plan to get the facts and to classify articles must be made and made at once, for Congress itself can not get these facts or make these classifications.

The tariff is fixed by facts; how to get at these facts is the first question in the whole tariff problem.

If any man needs the facts more than another it is the protectionist, like myself; because we can not wisely protect any business unless you know the facts about that business. In a purely revenue tariff some duties can be fixed without any facts, such as duties on coffee, tea, chocolate, tropical fruits, and other food necessities; for such a revenue tariff must include all of these because they are consumed by all of our people, not produced by any of our people, and therefore would be the best revenue producers of all imports.

Still the facts are also necessary to the advocate of a purely revenue tariff; for even such a tariff must sweep through thousands of articles because our needed revenue is so great. So the man who is for a purely revenue tariff should know the facts, and a man who is for a protective tariff must know the facts.

PLAN FOLLOWED IN BUSINESS.

How, then, can we best find out these facts? Common sense and experience answer the question. We should create a body of experts to find out these facts for us. These men should be the fittest men that can be found for this work; they should give their whole time to this work and lay before us the result of their investigations.

This plan is followed in business. Our largest industries keep experts at work all the time finding out the facts on which every branch of their trade depends. They send such men to all parts of the country and world to learn about new resources, trade conditions, and everything which helps them to do their business wisely.

Again, when a court of equity must hear a cause where large and varied accounts are to be examined or where masses of testimony are to be taken and sifted, the chancellor appoints a special commissioner to find out these widespread and mixed-up facts and lay them before the court classified and summarized.

Conditions have compelled us to do the same thing in government. For example, Congress created the Bureau of Corporations for this purpose. After years of thorough work by this Bureau no man in any party proposes to destroy it or stop its labors. The same is equally true of the Bureau of Labor.

EXPERTS FOR SIMPLER THINGS THAN THE TARIFF.

Again, the Senate some months ago ordered an investigation by these experts of a certain great trust. The other day, when it was proposed to stop this investigation, the Senate, after full debate, refused to do so. Again, a few weeks ago the President sent a commission to Goldfield, Nev., to find out the facts about the strike at that place, so that he could know whether to keep the nation's soldiers there or not; and everybody agreed that this was wise and necessary.

Again, Congress created the Industrial Commission to find out certain facts. The report of this Commission and those of the Interstate Commerce Commission resulted in the law for the Department of Commerce and Labor, the Bureau of Corporations, the Elkins law, the rate law, the immigration law, and most of the reform laws of the last six years.

Again, Congress created the Merchant Marine Commission, to find out the facts about our shipping and carrying trade; and while nothing has been done, yet we have the facts. Whether upon those facts we think it wise to do nothing or to do something, still we have no longer the excuse of ignorance.

Again, more than twenty years ago the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], whose work in this body has been so invaluable to the Republic, introduced and had passed the bill establishing the Interstate Commerce Commission. During most of its existence its duties have been chiefly and still largely are the finding of facts which Congress could not find—facts about rates, discriminations, and the like. No man in any party now proposes to abolish that Commission or curtail its powers.

IF THESE EXPERTS NECESSARY, TARIFF EXPERTS INDISPENSABLE.

But if we thought it wise for the President to send a commission to find out the facts in so simple a matter as a strike at Goldfield; if it is wise for a chancellor to appoint special examiners and commissioners to find out and report the facts in single cases; if the Senate directs the Bureau of Corporations to find out the facts about the doings of a single trust in a single branch of its activities; if Congress creates a body of men to find out the facts about any great business which the President thinks should be investigated, and if its work is so wise that no man in any party asks that that work be stopped, how much more should we create a body of men, specially fitted for the work, to find out the facts about our tariff, which is more important, more intricate, more difficult than all these other things put together.

If we provide experts to find out the facts about things which have to do with comparatively few of the people, how much more should we provide experts to find out the facts about a thing which has to do with all of the people. If we take such measures to learn the truth about matters which are easy to learn, how much more should we take similar measures to find out the truth about a matter that is hard to learn.

If it be said that we have no right to know the facts about any business, the answer is that when that business asks for protective duties we can fix those duties only by knowing the facts about that business. If we fix duties only by what that business says it wants, its managers would be fixing its own tariff instead of our fixing its tariff. It would be making a tariff law for itself instead of Congress making a tariff law for the people. Would it not seem that any business or any man who is against the plan of having experts with plenty of time find out the facts, that he does not want the facts found out?

WHAT CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEES HAVE TO DO WHEN MAKING A TARIFF.

Our tariff covers thousands of items. Whether duties should be placed upon these articles is a question of fact. The amount of the duty is an even harder question of fact. Heretofore we have forced committees of the House and the Senate to find out these facts. These committees do not work at the task all of the time. They work at it only when the tariff is being revised, which is about once in every ten years. Even then these committees work but for a few months, and only part of the time during these few months. That part of the time during these few months is not given wholly to the task of finding out the facts, but also to the fixing of duties upon these facts, considering how each of these duties affects the others, how each of them taken alone and all of them taken together affect our foreign and domestic trade, and all the other things that must be thought of in making a tariff.

TIME ACTUALLY SPENT ON TARIFF BILLS HERETOFORE.

For example, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House that framed the Dingley bill reported that bill the 19th day of March, 1897, so they did all the above work in less than four months. The Committee on Finance of the Senate took this bill and reported it back the 4th of May, 1897, so the Finance Committee did all this work in six weeks.

Again, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House that framed the McKinley bill reported that bill the 16th day of April, 1890, doing the work in less than five months. The Committee on Finance of the Senate took this bill and reported it back the 17th day of June, 1890, so the Finance Committee did all this work in two months.

Again, the Committee on Ways and Means that framed the Wilson bill reported that bill the 19th of December, 1893, so they did all the work in a little over four months. The Committee on Finance took this bill and reported it back the 20th day of March, 1894, so the Finance Committee of the Senate did all this work in three months.

TIME TAKEN BY SENATE COMMITTEE IN SMOOT CASE.

Compare this with the work of other Senate committees. On January 27, 1904, the Senate instructed the Committee on Privileges and Elections (one of the ablest committees of the Senate) to investigate the case of REED SMOOT, a Senator from Utah. Two years and six months later that committee made its report. Of these thirty months some members of the committee were at work all the time; and the full committee worked in actual session six solid months. The committee was aided by associations and persons who employed attorneys, detectives, etc., to look up facts and find witnesses.

If it took a Senate committee two years and six months working in some form all the time, and working steadily as a full committee six solid months to find out the facts in a single phase of the life of a single Senator, as was true in the Smoot case, how could a House committee, working part of the time for a few months and a Senate committee working part of the time for a few weeks, find out all the facts about all the articles in our tariff on which that committee fixes duties?

IS THIS FAIR TO ANYBODY?

Is it not plain that these committees, no matter how able, wise, and industrious, were overworked? Doubtless they did their work thoroughly, carefully, accurately as men could do it in such scanty time; but is it not asking too much of any man to crowd so much labor into so short a space? Is it fair to those committees? Is it fair to Congress? Is it fair to the thousands of American industries which, in their business, are affected by the tariff? Is it fair to the millions of farmers, wage-earners, and manufacturers who, as producers, are affected by the tariff? Is it fair to the 90,000,000 of the American people, who, as consumers, are affected by a tariff?

But not only are these committees forced to do this vast work in this brief time, but the members of these committees must do other heavy work at the same time.

OTHER WORK THAT MUST BE DONE BY MEMBERS OF THOSE COMMITTEES AT THE SAME TIME.

For example, the present committee of the Senate which must do the Senate work of tariff revision is ably presided over by Senator ALDRICH, but he is also a member of the Committees on Interstate Commerce, Rules, Cuban Relations, etc. The other members of the Senate Committee are—

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], but he is also chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, a member of the Committees on Appropriations, Philippines, Census, Canadian Relations, etc.

The Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT], but he is also chairman of the Committee on Printing and a member of the Committees on Naval Affairs, Interoceanic Canals, Civil Service, etc.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], but he is also chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, etc.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], but he is also chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, a member of the Committees on Naval Affairs, Philippines, Post-Offices and Post-Roads, etc.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], but he is also chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and a member of the Committees on the District of Columbia, Agriculture and Forestry, Irrigation, Library, etc.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but he is also chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and a member of the Committees on Commerce, Education and Labor, Immigration, Naval Affairs, etc.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], but he is also chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills and a member of the Committees on Commerce, the Census, and Interoceanic Canals.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], but he is also a member of the Committee on Appropriations, Education and Labor and is chairman of the Committee on Public Health.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], but he is also a member of the Committees on Appropriations, Philippines, Pensions, Mines and Mining, Geological Survey and is chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], but he is also a member of the Committees on Foreign Relations, Railroads, Agriculture and Forestry, etc.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], but he is also a member of the Committees on Rules, Census, Irrigation, etc.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO], but he is also a member of the Committees on Military Affairs, Coast Defenses, Interoceanic Canals, Cuban Relations, Post-Offices and Post-Roads, Pensions, and the Census.

Each of these Senators attends to the work of every committee on which he is a member. They are among the most industrious of our Senators. They neglect no duty on any committee to which they are assigned. The same is true of the members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

OCCUPATIONS OF MEMBERS OF COMMITTEES.

The same thing is true, Mr. President, in reference to the members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, in their ability, in their patriotism, and in their devotion to duty. But it may further be said that an examination of their occupations does not show that the Ways and Means Committee of the House or the Finance Committee of the Senate are especially fitted by their occupations and life work to act as experts in finding out the facts or arranging the classifications.

For instance, I have a list here of the members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives who framed the Dingley bill.

Mr. President, every member of that committee at that time, with two exceptions, was a lawyer; one was an editor and one was a wood manufacturer.

Take the present Ways and Means Committee of the other House. A mere reading of their names and their occupations in the Congressional Directory will disclose to the Senate what admirable men they are as legislators; but it does not disclose that they are especially fitted by their life work for economic investigation, because all of them but two are lawyers, one is a lumberman, and one has no occupation at all.

SUPPOSE THESE COMMITTEES HAD ONLY THE TARIFF FOR THEIR WORK.

But, Mr. President, this is not all. Each one of these Senators and Representatives is busy with politics in his own State. Some of them are leaders of their party. Some of them are lawyers in active practice. Some of them are managers of great business interests. But suppose that not a man of them did anything in politics, business, or law. Suppose every one of them were to quit all his work in the Senate and in the House except the work of the Finance Committee of the Senate and of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House. Suppose, for example, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]—the loved and honored leader of this body; a man whose work for nearly a half century has so enriched his country, which in return so much reveres him; a man whom every member of this body, without regard to party, fervently prays may remain with us as our leader for many and many a long year to come—suppose the Senator from Iowa were to leave his tremendous duties as chairman of the Appropriations Committee; suppose the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who commands the respect and confidence of the entire Congress, whose words are always so carefully weighed, and whose wisdom we so frequently follow, were to leave his duties, so delicate and so complex, as chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, duties that are bound to grow from this day on in a manner that few of us now suspect; suppose that every member of this committee were to abandon every duty to which he is assigned on the other committees of this Senate and were to devote his entire time for the few months during the short period when the tariff is revised to the sole work of finding out the facts concerning thousands and thousands of articles, of fixing the duties on those articles, of considering their effect on domestic and foreign trade, on the producer and consumer, and all the other things, would it not be difficult for them to do that?

WHAT HAPPENS AT COMMITTEE "HEARINGS."

These committees have hearings, sometimes private, sometimes public. At the public hearings the committee rooms overflow with representatives of various interests. The private hearings are equally congested. Both are rushed and confused. At these hearings there is no time, no opportunity, to go into any one subject thoroughly; no time, no opportunity, to test the statements there made; no time, no opportunity, to verify a single supposed fact.

If any interest wishes to get an unjust rate of duty, the hurry, confusion, incompleteness of these hearings give that interest the chance; and the still greater hurry and difficulty of fixing the duties themselves adds to that chance—all this, of course, without any member of the committee knowing or intending to aid such an interest in such a way.

The most honest and alert man could not possibly prevent or even know about incorrect statements; and the best of men might be excused from making a tariff rate which they did not intend to make and which, had they known all the facts, they never would have made. I do not suggest that this has occurred, but only that, by the present method, it might occur without any member of the committee knowing of it.

I repeat that the whole work of these committees is rushed. They must hurry. Business waits to know the new duties; and so the committees are driven at greatest possible speed. How easy in this necessary haste for certain interests to get unjust rates without the committees knowing that they are unjust, as well as for the committees themselves to make mistakes both of fact and judgment.

DIRECT TESTIMONY ON THE WORK OF FRAMING A TARIFF.

Senator Vest, of Missouri, has told what this work means. In a signed article in the Saturday Evening Post two or three years ago he gives a shocking account of the work of the Senate committee on the Wilson-Gorman bill; and he concludes as follows:

I look back now upon what occurred during the debate and conference on the Wilson-Gorman bill as a nightmare, from the effects of which I have never recovered.

Before the conference ended three of the conferees had broken down under the constant strain to which we were subjected. Wilson was attacked by facial erysipelas, and in a few days afterwards I became a victim of the same malady. We sat opposite to each other, our faces discolored by iodine and looking like two Indians painted for a war dance.

In a short time afterwards Senator Harris also went upon the sick list and told me subsequently that he dated the failure of his health from the effects of overwork and constant anxiety incident to the struggle over the Wilson-Gorman bill of 1894.

Senator Jones was also stricken down with angina pectoris and was compelled to go abroad in order to obtain relief. I have myself never been able to recover from the exhaustive labor to which I was subjected during that terrible struggle.

DIFFERENCES IN HOUSE AND SENATE BILLS.

If it is said that, no matter how hard the work, nevertheless these committees actually have done it in the past, one answer is suggested in the bills which these two committes reported when the tariff was last revised. I have carefully gone over the bill that Mr. Dingley reported to the House and which the House passed, also the bill which Mr. ALDRICH reported to the Senate, and have tabulated the duties which these two bills fixed on the same articles—as you can see, this research has meant months of work. The duties fixed on most of them by the House bill differ widely from those fixed by the Senate bill, and in many cases the differences are so wide apart that they are startling. I shall not give the whole list—it embraces thousands of articles. But here are a few samples:

a In the specific part of the duty.

These are only examples. There are hundreds like them. In the cotton and woolen schedule, the steel and iron schedule, and the glass schedule the House and Senate differ on numerous items. Frequently the House fixed specific duties, the Senate ad valorem duties. Sometimes the House and Senate put articles on the "free list" and the conference committee put heavy duties on those very articles. Sometimes the conference committee disregarded the duties of both Senate and House and fixed different duties and on a different basis; yet the conference committee was in session only five days.

COULD SENATE AND HOUSE HAVE HAD THE SAME FACTS.

Could the Senate and House committees have had the same information? If so, why these wide differences? If they had the same facts, how could the divergence in their judgment as to what duties ought to be fixed on those facts have been so great as the examples I have given? Remember that the members of these committees were experienced, able, careful men, and a majority of each committee were high protectionists, as I am myself. What explanation can there be except that these two committees were differently informed, or insufficiently informed, or both? Had these facts been carefully gotten up by a body of expert men, specially fitted for that work and with plenty of time to do the work, could there have been these astounding differences?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Would it interrupt the course of the Senator's argument if I were to ask him a few questions now?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It depends upon what the questions are, I will say frankly to the Senator. He can then determine whether he would like to ask the questions now. I am very willing, as the Senator knows, not only to answer all questions, but I invite them. But I want to make this presentation, this being the opening of the debate, in as clear and concise a manner as I possibly can, and in the order in which it is arranged. If the Senator wishes to ask me a question which will not break the chain of the argument, which I wish to preserve, I will answer it. However, I will say to the Senator and every other Senator that, as is my custom, at least I shall give him and every other Senator ample opportunity to ask any possible question as the debate proceeds. Now, then, the Senator can judge for himself whether he wishes to ask the question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will be very brief, I will say to the Senator. My purpose is to put the question to him so that in the course of his argument he may answer it.

I understand the purpose of the Senator in presenting the bill is to treat the tariff as an economic and not simply as a partisan question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; absolutely.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And in doing that he has provided that the commissioners shall be appointed solely with a view to their qualifications and without regard to political affiliations.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would ask the Senator if he would not strengthen that view of the case by providing in the bill that no more than four of the seven commissioners shall be members of one party.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know. It might strengthen it. I will say to the Senator, if, in the judgment of the Senate or of Congress, that would strengthen that feature—of its being absolutely nonpartisan—I should be delighted to incorporate it in the bill. That it a matter of detail in the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator, further, whether he has properly made up the commission? He provides that three of the members shall be identified with the producing interest, and one member shall be a lawyer, and so forth. I observe that in the bill no provision is made for the appointment of an agriculturist.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; the producing interest. The Senator is mistaken. I will say in answer to the Senator's question—then I want to say something to him—that he is mistaken. It is provided that three shall be from the producing classes. My own thought when I drafted it was that one should be an agriculturist, one should be a cattleman, and the other should be a manufacturer.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suggest to the Senator it might be well to make the bill more explicit in that particular.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It may be. Those are matters of detail. What I am now arguing is the theory of the bill, the necessity of the commission; and if it is just the same to the Senator I would be pleased if he would point out those matters at some later time in the debate, in view of the fact that they do not go to the general idea of the commission, to which I am now confining myself. I will gladly accept any suggestion that will strengthen this bill or make it more reasonable.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I did not expect the Senator to make an answer to these questions now. I am trying to put them briefly, and the Senator may reply to them in the course of his argument. I have one other inquiry to make.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I would not, of course, undertake to reply to questions which concern the detail of the bill during the course of this argument. If what the Senator is driving at, which is exactly the same thing that I wish to attain, is the best way, I should be very glad indeed to incorporate it in the bill. I will say this further thing right now and in that connection, that I am not, personally speaking, wedded to this bill or any particular bill. I am determined only on the idea of a commission to find out facts and make the classifications, and a plan of doing that must be made and made at once, because as I am demonstrating here Congress can not do it itself. I would be obliged to the Senator if he would withhold his suggestions while I am addressing the Senate on the details of the bill. I want now to speak on the theory of a commission.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will defer any further questions.

WANT OF CLASSIFICATION EVEN MORE SERIOUS.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But a more serious matter than all this is the matter of classifications. Most of the classifications of the present law are over a generation old. Any Senator will find that out by examining the language. Very few of them are modern and up to date. The reason of this is that when the committees come to revising the tariff in the great hurry I have shown has always existed and must exist, they were engrossed with the question of fixing duties, and so they took the language of the old classifications.

The result of this is that the importer very frequently does not know in what classification his import falls or what duty he pays. He must go first to the appraiser, who decides the question for him, and then, if dissatisfied, to the Board of Appraisers, and, if still dissatisfied, to the courts.

Mr. President, in the last ten years since this law was enacted there have been 300,000 such cases. I will send to the desk a clipping from this morning's Post which illustrates this, and I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Special to the Washington Post.]

NEW YORK, February 4, 1908.

A test case to determine the duty on certain valuable ores, imported by steel manufacturers, was under consideration to-day by the United States Board of General Appraisers. As it involves large sums, the case will go to the courts for a final decision.

The complaint is against the Midvale Steel Company, which, like other steel manufacturers, imports considerable quantities of ores known as ferrotungsten, ferrochrome, ferrovanadium, and ferromanganese, all of which contain a combination of the iron with another metal, and are desirable in producing special kinds of steel. This ore has been imported heretofore under a duty of $4 a ton. The Treasury Department contends that these should be dutiable at 20 per cent ad valorem.

Ferrovanadium in a pure form is valued at $10,000 a ton, and the duty at 20 per cent would be $2,000 instead of $4 a ton. Invoices show an importers' value of $5 a pound. Combined with iron, as common ferrovanadium ore, the value is $3,500 a ton. Ferrotungsten, on which this action is based, is valued at $1,000 a ton, and it is contended that it is dutiable at $200 a ton, not $4.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President and Senators, this is one of the cases immediately at hand this day where there is no classification for a most important article. This is one example of the 300,000 cases that have occurred in ten years, and this is because neither the importer nor the authorities know under what classification an import falls.

APPRAISERS AND COURTS LEGISLATING.

I call the attention of Senators, and especially the veteran Senators in this body, to the fact that these boards of appraisers and the courts, by deciding a classification to which any import belongs, are legislating every day, just as much as Congress legislates when it fixes the duties.

And worse than this, these contests have literally cost the Government and the importers millions of dollars; worse than this, this fact has lost to the importing industries many more millions of dollars; and far worse than all this, the industries thus affected have been confused, disturbed, and uncertain; and far worse than all this, the whole cost must fall upon the entire body of the American people from whom the revenue is raised to pay the expenses of the Government.

MOST IMPORTS FOR USE OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURERS.

I should not myself care, if the imports were merely used by people who prefer foreign goods to American goods, how much they paid; but remember that more than two-thirds of all of our imports are for the use of American manufacturers, who work those imports up into finished products and then sell them here or abroad.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was struck by one statement made by the Senator from Indiana, that the customs authorities in dealing with such duties as those covered by the newspaper clipping he has just had read were legislating just as much as Congress itself legislates regarding the tariff.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is exactly true.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am inclined to agree with him in that view, and I am also inclined to agree with him in the view that it is an impossible task for Congress to undertake to fix all the duties by original investigation and inquiry here. Now, right in this connection I would ask the Senator whether it would not improve this bill to provide a rule according to which the customs authorities may reduce certain excessive duties upon imports, duties which are admittedly excessive upon any theory, whether of a protective or a revenue tariff?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; I can answer the Senator without——

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator has not yet got my entire question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think I have, but go ahead.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator recognizes the fact that any radical change in the tariff would, of course, produce disturbances in the industries of the country, and that whatever is done in the future should be done gradually and progressively. Now, I ask the Senator whether it would not be possible in this bill, in addition to giving the commission power to make these inquiries and to make these reports, to give them the power to act (fixing the limitation of that power) as follows, for instance: To authorize the commission to reduce the duties at the rate of a certain percentage per annum for a certain number of years, such reduction to end when the total duty reached a minimum, we will say, of 40 per cent, or perhaps less, of the value of the imported products?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is the Senator through with his question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I simply wish to suggest to the Senator that at present no one knows what is the average percentage of duty imposed by this act. There has been in the past a comparison——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I can not yield for a speech, Mr. President. If the Senator wants to ask a question, there is no man on this floor more welcome to do so; but I want to conclude my remarks. If the Senator wants to make a speech, I can not yield for that purpose. I will try to answer any question he may ask.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is not my intention to amplify. I supposed the Senator would extend to me the same courtesy that he required of me and which I readily yielded when I recently made a speech upon the development of our inland waterways.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is true. And if the Senator puts it on that ground, of courst I will yield. I was merely trying to explain to him that I was proceeding to develop a theory. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And I supposed the Senator would be as eager to receive suggestions as I was.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will not proceed further.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am sorry the Senator takes that view of it. The Senator was asking a very long question, involving two or three questions, which I am trying to remember and will try to reply to. Then the Senator started out to make some remarks. It was pretty difficult to keep the whole thing in my mind. I will say to the Senator—not only personally, but in every other way—that I am not only willing to answer questions, but I invite questions at any time. The Senator knows my custom in this body in that regard, especially with reference to himself.

Now, with reference to the question which the Senator suggests. No; I must say frankly that I do not think that suggestion would improve the bill. If it should be thought that it would improve the bill, very well. But I call the attention of the Senator to two or three facts. The Senator spoke about giving the commission power to reduce ad valorem duties. We have no fixed rate, neither specific nor ad valorem. So the Senator will see at once that his question would need to be reframed on a little bit further examination of the facts. I would not give the commission any power with reference to the tariff.

Further, I agree with the Senator that the tariff in any event should not be revised in any radical way. What I am trying to do is to get at the facts. The theory of the commission, according to this bill, is not to give the commission such power as that.

I will say to the Senator, too, that I think it is impossible to indicate a rule to the appraisers or the courts either or to any body of men by which they can determine more easily in which classification an article belongs that is not classified. That is a question of judgment. To do that would be a greater work than to classify. The only remedy for that thing is to accurately classify the articles, and that is something that we have not done and something that Congress can not do for the reasons I have given. I think the Senator will see, as I read some of the illustrations of this, that upon a further examination of the facts, with the curious mixed duties and everything else, he will have to reframe his question for want of this classification, which very few men I find understand or have paid any attention to. In fact I will stop right here now and ask a question which will test it in a very striking way.

Now, I will ask two questions. I will ask whether there is any Senator present—I will narrow it—whether there is any member of the Finance Committee present who can now tell this body out of the thousands of duties A SINGLE SCORE OF THEM, with the facts upon which they are based, and the reasons for it? Is there any Senator or even any member of the Finance Committee who can name twenty classifications? I will pause for a reply. Give it, if there is.

PROOF OF CLOUDED CLASSIFICATIONS.

I will follow up that question by the statement that the German expert commission can offhand answer that question concerning our own tariff.

Now, for want of this classification there have been the most amazing varieties of articles arbitrarily classified by board and courts which in doing it are legislating in the most astonishing way, under a single head. I will give the Senate a single illustration—I could read illustrations all the afternoon and all tomorrow. Section 193 of the Dingley law reads as follows:

Articles or wares not especially provided for in this act, composed wholly or in part of iron, steel, lead, copper, nickel, pewter, zinc, gold, silver, platinum, aluminum, or other metal, and whether partly or wholly manufactured, 45 per cent ad valorem.

Under that paragraph our customs officers have subjected to the 45 per cent ad valorem the following articles: Stoves, implements, electrical apparatus, andirons, gold and silver boxes, tin or brass boxes, brass ball chains, brass buckles, brass tubes for bedsteads, brass wire, brass sheets, brick trowels, britannia metal ware, bronze crosses for churches, bullets, bull's-eye lanterns, buttons with metal shanks, cabs, carriages, carts, buggies, trucks, railway cars, automobiles, candelabra, cannon, metal capsules, iron castings, cast-steel tools, chafing dishes, chisels, church bells, coal scuttles, currycombs, compasses, nails, copper spikes, copper wire, cranks and shafts, curriers' knives, daguerreotype plates, drawing instruments, dress trimmings in which metal is the material of chief value, embossing dies, engravers' tools, enameled portraits, metal eyelets, pistols and other firearms, fluoroscopes, and metal foil.

These are only a few instances taken from an alphabetical arrangement of the tariff decisions, and I only got through letter F. It can be easily imagined to what extent these instances can be multiplied by going through the entire alphabet for the decisions under that paragraph alone.

BUTTONS AND STOVES CLASSED TOGETHER!

Will anyone contend that a simple article like nails or wire requires the same amount of protection as so complex a mechanism as a revolver or an electric dynamo?

Is there any logic in classing buttons and stoves together?

Should bullets and buggies, should automobiles and bull's-eye lanterns pay the same duty?

Are farm implements and gold boxes in the same class?

Is there any connection between carriages and dress trimmings?

Why classify railway cars and enameled portraits together?

Why should cannon for war and crosses for churches be put in the same class?

Yet all these are in the same classification and pay the same rates.

But more absurd than this is the fact that they are put in the same classification by the appraisers and the courts, passing on each article because Congress did not classify them at all.

And as outrageous as it is absurd is the fact that nobody knew what duties these articles would have to pay until the guess of the appraisers and the courts filled up the holes in the law.

THE GERMAN CLASSIFICATION.

Compared with the scientific, clear, accurate classification of the German schedules, for instance, our classifications are confused, uncertain, chaotic. The German tariff which I hold in my hand—any Senator can examine it—places each article exactly where it belongs, plainly specifies it and fixes the duty to be paid on it in a marginal column so that every nation who sells goods to German producers and every German producer that buys goods from other nations knows precisely the duty that must be paid on almost every article. Of course, cases arise in Germany where the classifications of some articles are open to dispute; but such cases are rare compared with like cases in our tariff. In short, the German classification reduces confusion and doubt to the minimum; our classification raises confusion and doubt to the maximum.

THE GERMAN COMMISSION.

How did Germany make her tariff classifications so much clearer, simpler, and more accurate than ours? By the commonsense plan of having an expert commission arrange these classifications. But that was only a part of the work of the German commission. Years ago Germany saw that only a body of experts could get the facts and arrange the schedules for her tariff; she saw that the only work which the Reichstag could do was the fixing of duties to the items which the expert commission found out and laid before the Reichstag. So Germany selected for this work thirty of the best fitted men to be found in the Empire.

This commission consulted more than 2,000 trade and industrial experts. It investigated every phase of every industry in the Empire which might bear upon the tariff. It considered all these industries both separately and in relation to the others. It carefully studied the tariffs of other countries. It gave due weight to Germany's export trade. In short, everything that goes into the making of a tariff was worked out to the smallest detail by this German expert commission. It spent almost six years at this work, although it would not be necessary for our commission to work so long. For the German commission framed the bill; the general government then sent it to each state forming the German Empire, those states took a year to consider it, and then it was returned and a copy of the revised bill sent to every productive industry in the empire. It may be said that the German commission worked perhaps two years and a half on the labor which I am proposing our Commission shall do. They laid the results of this work before the Reichstag, and upon that work Germany built her present tariff.

OUR EXPORTS COMPARED WITH GERMANY'S.

Japan, France, and other up-to-date countries follow the same plan. They came to see, as we are coming to see, that in no other way could a tariff be builded with knowledge and wisdom. By this plan and by maximum and minimum tariff the foreign trade of Germany has passed every other country, comparatively speaking.

The German Empire, with an area nineteen times smaller than the United States, and most of its land poor and unproductive, and with a population less than two-thirds as great as ours, nevertheless exports more than one and a half billion dollars' worth of German products, more than two-thirds of which are manufactured articles, whereas we export $1,717,953,000 worth of products, most of which are raw material.

Only $460,000,000, or 27 per cent, of our exports are manufactured articles, and $226,000,000, or 13 per cent, are semi-manufactured articles, and of these, nearly all are steel, copper, and petroleum, requiring so little skilled labor that they are nearly raw material.

So we see that German exports of manufactured products are far greater than our own, and if our superior advantage in population and resources are considered their lead is astonishing, humiliating. It is her foreign markets that give Germany her industrial prosperity. Indeed, it is her foreign markets which enable Germany to live. The time is here when foreign markets for our manufactures are becoming almost as important to American industry as they are to German industry. This one fact alone commands us to take the same up-to-date, scientific steps with our tariff that Germany has taken with her tariff.

COMMISSION NECESSARY, REGARDLESS OF THEORY ON WHICH TARIFF REVISED.

I shall not go into the tariff question as such. Whether any man favors a purely revenue tariff, a straight protective tariff, or any other kind of a tariff, Congress can not do without this body of experts to help it with facts and classifications. Yet one brief word should be said at this moment about our tariff policy. We must have more foreign trade. We must open foreign markets to our live cattle, which are now kept out of those markets.

Our Government should get the same advantages for American manufacturers in foreign trade that the German Government gets for German manufacturers in foreign trade.

American producers demand that the doors of other nations which are open to their rivals shall no longer be closed to them.

We can not open these doors by a purely revenue tariff, because such a tariff gives other nations trade advantages with us without getting from those other nations any trade advantages in return.

A straight-out protective tariff gives other nations no trade advantages with us, but neither does it get any trade advantages from them.

MAXIMUM AND MINIMUM TARIFFS OUR TRUE POLICY.

We must have a system that gives us the same weapons that our rivals have, by which we can get for our producers the same favors that our rivals get for their producers. We must have a double tariff, the first to apply to such nations as will not give our producers special favors in their markets, and the last to apply to such nations as will give our producers special favors in their markets. By this plan German producers, comparatively speaking, are selling more German goods abroad than any other nation.

Every up-to-date nation, except Great Britain and ourselves, has now adopted the maximum and minimum tariff plan; and the agitation for this plan has begun in Great Britain. Canada has just enacted a triple tariff; by this she has gotten a practical monopoly for her live stock in the markets of France. Only Great Britain, Persia, Abyssinia, and China now have purely revenue tariffs; only the United States and a few South American countries now have straight-out protective tariffs.

Our rivals followed our plan of a single protective tariff and then logically developed that plan into a double protective plan. We must be as wise now as they were then; and just as they took the single protective plan from us, so now we must take the double protective plan from them. Our manufacturers, our cattlemen, our agriculturalists, our miners, our whole producing classes ask only the same advantages that their rivals have in the markets of the world. They demand no more than this; they will accept no less. Tariff for protection! Yes, but also tariff for trade; trade for prosperity; common-sense method for both—these must henceforth be the American watchwords in the world-wide contest for commerce.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, necessarily it is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of the tariff question at this time or to discuss the bill which has been introduced by the Senator from Indiana. The occasion seems appropriate, however, for me to say that the Senator from Indiana is to be congratulated that to some degree at least he has joined the army of tariff revisionists. It is true the Senator has expressed no opinion of any schedule of the tariff, but the very fact that he deems an inquiry into these schedules necessary is to my mind an indication at least that the Senator believes there ought to be a revision.

It is unfortunate, however, as it occurs to me, that the Senator and the Senate and the country, according to the newspapers of yesterday and to-day, have been advised by another authority on the other side of the Chamber that even an inquiry into the tariff system shall not be made now by a commission or otherwise. The rules of the Senate forbid any more specific reference to the veto upon this proposed legislation, which has been announced.

I do not agree with the Senator as to the necessity for a commission to make this inquiry, and I do not agree with several suggestions he has made. I want to advise him that there are four great facts already established with reference to the tariff, needing no further inquiry and upon which the Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives are now competent to legislate.

The first is that the average ad valorem tariff tax is 45 per cent, as I understand it.

The second fact is that the average tariff which we have now is far greater than the difference between the cost of labor in foreign countries and in this country. So whatever a man may be, whether he be a protectionist, or a revenue reformer, like myself, the fact stares him in the face that we have schedules now which go far beyond the difference between the cost of labor in foreign countries and in the United States.

The third fact, which is indisputable, is that manufactured articles in the United States in a number of instances are sold in foreign countries under the present tariff at a lower rate than in America.

The fourth fact, which is already established and in the minds of the American people, is that a protective tariff fosters and encourages the creation of trusts.

Now, I want to have printed in the RECORD, following what I have said, an article on the question of the tariff, largely written by a member of the Industrial Commission, the creation of which has been extolled by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator in what book the article appears?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is a book which I am sure will appeal to the confidence of the Senator from Indiana, because it is the Democratic Campign Book——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought it was.

Mr. CULBERSON. For the Congressional elections of 1902.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought so.

Mr. CULBERSON. This article was written by Mr. Byron W. Holt, a member of the Industrial Commission of 1901, and it treats of tariff and trusts, and particularly of the selling prices in this country and in foreign countries in certain cases of protected articles.

Mr. President, I have thought proper to say this much in the interest of the general move which the Senator from Indiana has made for tariff revision, and I ask that the article may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD following what I have said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE TARIFF AND TRUSTS.[a]

A theoretical discussion of the tariff question is unnecessary at the present time in this book. It is unnecessary, because we have before us in concrete form the results of a high protective tariff, and no one who has eyes, ears, a conscience, and an average supply of gray matter, can, with these object lessons before him, longer doubt the bad effects of protective tariffs.

TRUST OBJECT LESSONS.

The trusts have made the tariff a very practical question to ordinary business men, farmers, and laborers. Protected from outside competition by high tariff walls, we have hundreds of trusts which charge as high prices for their products as the tariff will permit, and squeeze the last penny out of our home consumers, while selling hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of their products in foreign countries on the lower level of prices which prevails outside of our tariff walls. This outrage on our long-suffering consumers has been carried on so long that the trusts are now assuming that the people rather like to pay two prices for their goods, and are boasting of the prosperity that they say always accompanies high prices.

GOOD CROP AND NOT HIGH TARIFF PROSPERITY.

It can not be denied that after a succession of five or six good crops in our great grain-growing sections, and, with a like number of crop failures in many foreign countries, there is a considerable measure of prosperity in certain sections and with certain classes. But good crops are not the result of a high tariff. On the contrary, what prosperity we have is in spite of the tariff, and would be far greater and more general if we had no protective duties at all. Only the trusts, our hundreds of million and billion dollar "infants," would enjoy less prosperity and go into decline if "protection" were dumped in the world's rubbish heap of worn-out theories.

ERA OF TRUSTS AND HIGH PRICES.

The era of trusts really began shortly after the passage of the Dingley bill in 1897. Since then prices have advanced to the highest point ever recorded, and the cost of living is 40 per cent higher than in 1897, while wages are little or no higher, and, in fact, are lower in some industries. Of course, wage-earners, even when steadily employed, are finding it extremely difficult to live and support, or half support, their families, and it is galling to them to be constantly told by Republicans of our "wonderful prosperity"—for trusts. Tens of thousands of workers are now on strike, and are asking that their share of their rapidly increasing output be not allowed to diminish so rapidly. The trusts turn a deaf ear to labor, and are bringing in, on their railroads and steamships, immigrants (labor being on the free list) to fill the strikers' places in the protected mines and mills.

[a] Unless otherwise specified, the matter under the general head "Tariff and trusts" has been prepared by Mr. Byron W. Holt. Much of the matter on the window glass, tin plate, steel and wire, and borax trusts, and on the "Evils of protected trusts," is from Mr. Holt's testimony before the Industrial Commission, May 10, 1901.

The farmers in the Eastern and Middle States are reading about prosperity, but are not, as a rule, experiencing it. It costs them far more to live now than formerly, and as they do not and can not raise stock and grain for export in competition with the West, they do not share in the benefits of high prices for grains and meats. Hence it is not strange that, as reliable and well-informed real estate men tell us, the farms of the Eastern and Middle States, including Ohio and West Virginia, would not now sell for the amount of the mortgages on them.

BULLDOZING METHODS OF GREAT TRUSTS.

The ordinary business man, manufacturer, or trader is enjoying only a small measure of reflected prosperity, and often he is permitted to exist at all only at the option and mercy of the great trusts which bulldoze and coerce him, until he wonders if he lives in a free republic or in Russia. The autocratic, arbitrary, domineering, high-handed tactics of the great steel trust, the Standard Oil, tobacco, plate glass, and other trusts are but little known outside of the trade circles in each line of business. Thousands of manufacturers and dealers must buy of the trusts, and only of the trusts, or they can not get any trust goods at all, and may be driven out of business. They must ship over the railroads designated by the trusts; must finance their accounts in the banks designated, and often must give credits and sell their goods at prices, or in restricted territory, dictated by the meddlesome but all-powerful trusts. A large dealer in steel goods says:

"In our business, which, as you know, consists of a pool of the companies in this line of business, we are not allowed to buy a ton of material outside of the trust. The trust also dictates the prices at which our goods must be sold. We do business entirely at the mercy of the trust. We are not free men, and there are very few free men left in the iron and steel industry. Many of the employees of the steel trust tell me that they must either do as they are told or give up their positions. The policy of the company is to sandbag every industry with which it comes in contact. We do not dare to complain publicly or we would be driven out of business. If any of us would appear before an investigating committee, our business would vanish."

TARIFF TIES CONSUMERS' HANDS WHILE TRUSTS PICK HIS POCKETS.

While the tariff is only one of the special privileges which breed trusts, it is, or at least has been, in this country, the most important and the most conspicuous of these special privileges. It is not only responsible for the birth of many of our trusts, but it is responsible for most of the harm done by them during the last fifteen years. It ties the hands of the American consumer while the trusts pick his pockets. It is because of the excessively high protective duties that this country led the way in the formation of trusts and that it to-day has twice as many trusts as any other country. The only other countries which have trusts comparable to ours are the protected countries of continental Europe—notably Germany and Austria.

It is certainly easier, in most industries, to form a trust in one country than to form a world-wide trust. Tariff duties, such as this country levies, practically alienate us from the rest of the world, so far as concerns many industries, and make it easier for our producers in any one line to combine, formally or informally, and to put prices up to the import level of the duty-paid prices of foreign goods. This our protected trusts have done extensively. If they have not at any time collected from the American consumers all the tariff has permitted them to collect, it is either because they have not fully appreciated the situation and have not gotten together sufficiently to stop all internal competition, or because the full-limit price would greatly lessen consumption and would not yield as great a net profit as will lower prices.

These oversights and limitations are being rapidly considered and corrected by the formation of larger and larger trusts. Not only does the modern trust include all competitors in one industry, as in tin plate, wire, nails, steel hoops, tubes, pressed steel, etc., but it includes all the allied industries whose plants could be easily turned from the production of one to another of these products. Not only this, it includes some of the industries which produce different but competing products, such as coal, oil, gas, and electricity, for heating and lighting purposes.

TARIFF CONCENTRATES WEALTH AND THUS HASTENS GREAT TRUSTS.

But for our absurdly high tariff there would not have been, at least at present, that great accumulation of wealth in the hands of a few which makes easy the formation of great industrial and transportation combinations. It is the unjustly, though perhaps legally, acquired wealth of the protected interests, concentrated in the hands of a comparatively few, which is now being employed to buy up and control the natural sources of production and routes of transportation.

In many industries internal competition has become so great that the tariff can not be utilized unless it is accompanied by a monopoly of natural sources. Thus, not only was the tariff responsible for many of the earlier and smaller trusts, but it has hastened and has been instrumental in the formation of the gigantic trusts of to-day, buttressed by tariffs, patents, and natural monopolies. We are now in the stage of trust development where the tariff is being combined with other special privileges in order that trusts may do their worst in oppressing consumers. It is not yet too late to prevent, by abolishing protective tariff duties, the formation of many great trusts now in the chrysalis stage, or to prevent the exaction by existing trusts of the monopoly profits which the tariff now permits them to extort from our consumers.

Only a dozen or so of the trusts have been written up in detail in this book. These will serve simply as samples. The list of 287 corporate trusts in the appendix contains, as indicated, nearly 200 trusts more or less benefited by the tariff. Many of those not written up are just as bad and some, perhaps, worse than those chosen as samples.

A list of prices of trust commodities is printed in the appendix. Also Dun's "Index numbers," showing the comparative cost of living for fourteen years. Other information on this subject is contained in the article entitled "Wages and prices." An article on "Export prices" and extracts from Mr. Schwab's testimony before the Industrial Commission make interesting reading on a subject which both the trusts and the Republicans are loath to discuss.

EXPORT PRICES.

PROTECTED TRUSTS AND MANUFACTURERS GET ALL THE TARIFF WILL ALLOW IN OUR MARKETS AND SELL IN FOREIGN MARKETS AT KNOCK-DOWN PRICES—DIFFICULT TO OBTAIN EXACT EXPORT PRICES—ONLY A FEW SAMPLES ARE GIVEN IN THIS BOOK—EVIDENCE IS INCONTROVERTIBLE THAT PRACTICALLY ALL MANUFACTURED GOODS ARE SOLD FOR EXPORT MUCH BELOW HOME-MARKET PRICES—PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS OF PARTS OF EXPORT JOURNALS AND OF "PRICES CURRENT DISCOUNT SHEET," WHICH HAS BEEN OBTAINED FROM A FOREIGN COUNTRY BY A REWARD OF $100.

In his speech of April 16, 1902, Congressman Malcolm R. Patterson, of Tennessee, discussed the evils of the protective tariff system and dwelt at length upon the evil of protection in permitting and encouraging manufacturers to form trusts and sustain prices at home while favoring foreigners with low prices, to which we, who have paid tariff taxes during the "coddling" stage, ought now to be fairly entitled. On this subject Congressman Patterson said:

"The third and most intolerable condition of all came when allied wealth, in the form of trusts, demanded and received still greater protection and then, holding the home consumer at their mercy, began to export and sell their manufactured products to foreigners at less cost than to Americans.

"This odious condition of affairs has been made possible by the system of misnamed protection, which fleeces the home consumer, who pays the tariff duties, and gives to the alien a benefit denied to our own people. A system so constructed as to demand and receive the highest price at home and the lowest price abroad for its manufactured products is one which can neither be approved in fair business dealings nor in sound morals.

"REFORM CLUB EXPOSÉ IN 1890.

"The first time that the attention of the public was called to the enormity of this evil was in 1890, when the tariff-reform committee of the Reform Club published a pamphlet entitled 'Protection's home market.' In this pamphlet we find quoted the domestic and export prices of numerous agricultural implements and tools, of kitchen utensils and household goods, carpenters' tools, hardware, etc. The domestic prices usually exceed the foreign prices from 10 to 25 per cent, but the difference reached 100 per cent in certain cases. A few of the articles and prices are found in the following table:

Articles.	Domestic price.	Foreign price.
Cultivators	$11.00	$8.40
Plows	14.00	12.60
Axes, per dozen	8.24	7.20
Kettles	1.40	.85
Wire nails, per 100 pounds	2.25	1.35
Table knives, per gross	15.00	12.00
Horse nails, per pound	.17	.14
Barbed wire, per 100 pounds	3.00	2.00
Rivets, per 100 pounds	10.00	5.55
Typewriters	100.00	60.00
Sewing machines:
Fine	27.50	20.75
Medium	22.00	17.50
Cheap	18.00	12.00

"In some cases our sewing machines have been sold as low as $5 in the South American market."

ADMISSIONS FROM REPUBLICAN PAPERS.

There are many quotations available from Republican sources, admitting, explaining, or attempting to justify the custom of charging lower prices for export. Thus the New York Press of October 22, 1889, said:

"It is sometimes looked upon as wise to ship goods out of the country at cost, rather than break the regular price for which such articles sell in the country in which they are produced."

The American Machinist of September 26, 1889, said:

"Just why American manufacturers will sell machinery and other goods from 10 to 30 per cent cheaper in Europe than they will sell them to be used at home is rather puzzling; but anyone curious in the matter can easily enough find out that many of them do that. It may be necessary to cut prices in order to secure trade from abroad, but it is likely to strike the American purchaser as being a little rough on him."

The Engineering and Mining Journal of March 15, 1890, complained of the system, as follows:

"As soon as an industry has obtained a position where it can more than supply our home market and has to send its goods abroad, where they compete with those of foreign manufacturers, it is evident that they are either giving the foreigners the benefit of lower rates than they do our own people or that they are able to get along at home without any protection from foreign manufacturers. It is not fair that our own people should be made to pay more than foreigners for the products of our own land."

A LARGE MANUFACTURER'S FRANK STATEMENT.

A letter from Mr. A. B. Farquhar, the head of the great Pennsylvania Agricultural Works, to the Farmer's Call, of Quincy, Ill., may be quoted here. In answer to the Call's questions, Mr. Farquhar said:

"JULY 30, 1890.

"The fact is that our protective laws are a monstrous swindle upon the agricultural community. As a manufacturer, I was inclined to say nothing on the subject, for the reason that it was natural to suppose if anybody was benefited it was the manufacturing class, to which I belong. But, as I have explained, the farmer is being destroyed. We are killing the goose for the golden egg. And I honestly believe now that it is to the interest of the manufacturers themselves to eliminate the protective feature from our tariff laws.

"Certainly, as our manufactures are sold much lower abroad, we could only need protection to get better prices from our customers at home. We do manufacture and sell in Canada, South America, and Europe many agricultural implements and machines, and could we have free raw material and the commercial advantages which free trade would give us, America would become the great manufacturing emporium of the world, and the farmer, of course, would share the prosperity, since he would have less to pay for everything and get better prices for all he sold. Go on with your good work. When the farmer begins to think and rise up against this swindle it is doomed."

EXPORT PRICES ARE RETAIL PRICES.

In answer to a claim made by the Australasian and South American (an export journal) that the lower prices quoted foreigners were for the wholesale trade only, the New York World publishes the following letter from the Engineering and Mining Journal of New York:

ENGINEERING AND MINING JOURNAL,
New York, August 26, 1890.

DEAR SIR: I am obliged to you for the letter of August 25, respecting proceedings taken in the Senate regarding our "prices current."

Prices quoted by us are, as you will notice at the head of the first column, "for export only," and the prices therein given are the prices at which every foreign subscriber can buy in this market. It stands to reason that orders for farm implements are frequently given for one only. If to buy one machine is retail trade, then these foreign prices are retail prices.

Our domestic subscribers are debarred from the prices quoted in these columns. These special discounts are "for export only," and in more than one instance we have lost our advertiser through publishing these prices.

I inclose an invoice from S. Allen & Co., which you will see is for one of the machines quoted by us, and you will notice that it conforms exactly with our prices as reprinted by you in the World, and that the net price on the bill is exactly as stated by you in the World.

Your statement that the foreigner can buy at retail in this market cheaper than the domestic consumer is as indisputable as the daily revolution of the earth. We can enumerate any number of instances where houses have written us: "Prices furnished are for export only, and it would be most injurious to us if these figures were circulated in the home market."

In going through our letters this morning we counted no less than fifty-eight received during the month of July, thanking us for publishing the "prices current," as it enabled our subscribers to keep a check on the prices charged them on their indents.

Yours, very truly,

ENGINEERING AND MINING JOURNAL.

After examining the facts, Mr. J. Alex. Lindquist, the author of the tariff-reform pamphlet, concludes:

"That our manufacturers take advantage of our tariff to keep the price of their goods in our home market not merely much higher than they could do if there were no tariff, but much higher than they themselves would be able and willing to produce and sell the same goods for if they were not protected at all."

And asks the following pertinent question:

"Why should our manufacturers be aided by our laws to charge our citizens more for the same goods than they do foreigners?"

ADMISSIONS FROM GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS IN 1900.

We find in a Government publication—the Report of the Bureau of Statistics, Commerce, and Finance—for August, 1900, under undoubted Republican auspices, a large number of valuable statements and confessions. We are informed, for instance, that "the progress of work on shipbuilding in the United States has been retarded because makers of steel materials require a higher price from the American consumers than from the foreign consumers for substantially similar products." Also, in addition to this, that "American export plate makers are interested in preventing the establishment of plate manufacturing in their customer nations abroad, and to that end bid low enough in foreign markets to discourage foreign nations from entering the field for producing their own plate at home." The same authority contends that this policy is "short sighted," and shows how it has resulted in curtailing the home demand. Up to April, 1900, it "had resulted in a very positive shrinkage in domestic consumption. Farmers had ceased to purchase barbed wire for wire fences. Retail hardware dealers had complained for months of diminished business in nails and wires. Jobbers had gotten in the way of doing a hand-to-mouth business on prices that had advanced from $1.35 to $3.20 in the course of a year." The writer goes on to say:

"If steel rails, for example, sell at Pittsburg for $35 per ton for months in succession for home consumption, while the foreign consumer is purchasing them for $22 to $24 per ton, the domestic market is sure to order no more than it is obliged to have for the time being. In the long run such a policy is shortsighted, because it puts an embargo on the expansion of investments in enterprises requiring iron and steel. It arrests constructive projects at home, while it stimulates construction abroad."

SMALL MANUFACTURERS SQUEEZED AND KICKING.

Those of our manufacturing interests that are outside of the trusts desire most earnestly that this condition of affairs should not continue. A good illustration of the way in which they regard the matter is afforded by a recent letter to the editor of the Iron Age, of New York, from Mr. F. A. Wilmot, president of the Wilmot & Hobbs Manufacturing Company, of Bridgeport, Conn., a portion of which reads as follows:

"We would suggest that you give due prominence to the position which the manufacturing associations in the various cities, particularly along the Atlantic seaboard and Canadian border, and especially in New England, are taking as regards their present handicap in the cost of raw material—such as coal, coke, iron ore, pig iron, steel ingots, and billets—and their desire to have these commodities placed by Congress immediately on the free list. They believe that as these materials are produced cheaper in this country than in any other portion of the world and are sold abroad at lower prices than along the seaboard and Canadian border, the industries which produce them are no longer infant and do not need protection. They believe that protection, so called, is but another term for Government assistance to monopolies and trusts. This position the Government, as it now exists, can ill afford to assume, nor can it allow the people to feel that it is drifting into such a position where it is so working hand in hand with gigantic trusts, for when the people realize such to be the condition they will undoubtedly rise in their might and by their votes change the conditions and the Government which permits such conditions. * * * It is to be hoped that the Government of the United States will appreciate the position and make such changes in tariff regulations or duties from time to time as will result in putting upon the free list such commodities as do not further need protection on the score of their being infant industries."

This letter and other similar testimony does not indicate that the smaller manufacturers would be injured by a reduction of tariff duties.

EVERYTHING LOWER FOR EXPORT, SAYS CHARLES M. SCHWAB.

In May, 1901, less than a year ago, Mr. Charles M. Schwab, the president of the steel trust, testifying before the Industrial Commission startled the country by declaring that all kinds of American goods were usually sold much lower for export than in the home market. In fact, he said that the prices of everything for export were less than for domestic use and consumption, and that supplies and materials to be used in products for export were usually furnished to manufacturers at special prices, while goods to be exported were carried by the railroads at reduced rates. Here are some extracts from Mr. Schwab's testimony:

"It is quite true that export prices are made at a very much lower rate than those here. * * * I think you can safely say this, that where large export business is done—for example, in the line of iron and steel—nearly all the people from whom supplies are bought for that purpose give you a good price for the materials that go into export; railroads will, in most instances, carry them a little cheaper for you, and so on all down the line."

Q. "Is it a fact generally true of all exporters in this country that they do sell at lower prices in foreign markets than they do in the home market?"—A. "That is true, perfectly true."

STEEL RAILS FOR EXPORT.

The New York World of April 9, 1901, contains the following:

"Mr. Charles Thulin, a Pennsylvania contractor, recently secured a contract to supply rails for Russia's great Siberian railway. He asked the leading steel trust companies here for bids. They all asked him about $35 per ton, with freight to be added. Mr. Thulin went over to England, sublet his contract to an English firm, and one of the same companies that had asked him $35, plus freight here, sold the rails at $24 a ton delivered in England to the English subcontractor." * * *

WIRE ROPE AT LESS THAN HALF PRICE TO FOREIGNERS.

The record in regard to the prices, foreign and domestic, of wire and wire rope is instructive and illustrative of the rapacity of the trust and the fraud practiced on the American consumer. The trust controlling these articles have put prices at home up to the tariff limit, while lowering prices to foreigners, so that our wire rope is exported to every foreign country, with the possible exception of England. As the duty on imported wire rope averages about 100 per cent, the trust charges domestic consumers about twice as much as it charges foreigners for its goods—often more than twice as much. For example, the domestic price of wire rope is about $5, $6, and $7.50 per 100 pounds, according to the different sizes, but the export prices for these sizes, respectively, are $2.34, $3.23, and $3.88. The prices of wire vary also according to the size. For the largest size the domestic price is about $4.25 per 100 pound, and the export price about $2.62, or about 65 per cent in favor of the foreigner.

OIL MACHINERY CHEAPER IN RUSSIA.

Our oil machinery manufactured in this country follows the same rule as our agricultural machinery. The farmers of Mexico, South America, and Canada can obtain our agricultural implements for half the money that our own farmers have to pay for them, and our oil machinery is sold at lower figure to the Russians than to our own oil producers in Texas.

HAWAIIANS AND PORTO RICANS PAYING FOR "OLD GLORY."

This favoritism to foreigners has been extended more or less to those nondescript peoples, half foreigners and half domestic, who inhabit our colonial possessions, such as Hawaii and Porto Rico. Some of our manufacturers treat these people as foreigners and sell them our goods at reduced rates, and some treat them as people of our own country, and charge them accordingly.

An instance is cited where goods had been sold in Honolulu at such low prices that great quantities of them were brought back to California and sold there at profit in competition with similar goods in the domestic market which have never been out of the country. One of the aggrieved manufacturers registered his complaint in a letter to the Iron Age of June 27, 1901, in which he said:

"It so happens that at present the price of our goods is about 25 per cent higher for domestic consumption than the export prices. We had an inquiry for export prices, which we quoted. The order now comes in to be shipped to Honolulu. Is it fair to consider the Hawaiian Islands entitled to export prices?

"Our own opinion is that they have become a part of the United States, and should be considered domestic territory as much as Alaska. Also, we understand our tariff applies to this territory, so that they are prohibited from buying outside, and we are thus enabled to get domestic prices."

This manufacturer's reasoning appears to be sound, but it does not appear to have had the desired effect on the other faction, which, judging from the following letter in the Iron Age of December 5, 1901, is still continuing its pernicious practice of treating Hawaiians as foreigners:

"Your journal has from time to time called attention to the demoralizing practice of many American manufacturers of still continuing 'export prices' in the Hawaiian Islands, notwithstanding the fact that these islands are now a part and parcel of the United States.

"There are no custom-house restrictions between the two countries to prevent goods sold at the export price being reentered in the United States, which has been and is being done, to the great detriment of many of your readers.

"It would be the proper thing if all manufacturers would take the same view of it as a leading manufacturer, who recently wrote a letter as follows:

"'We discontinued the use of export prices for the Hawaiian Islands some time ago, as we now consider that this united country is a part of the great Republic. We do not see any logical reason why its inhabitants, in consideration of the great privilege of flying the Stars and Stripes, should not pay the present high American values on the commodities they consume.'"

The Iron Age says that "this hits the nail on the head, and we hope the publication of this letter will enlighten some American manufacturers who do not seem to know that the Hawaiian Islands are no longer export, but domestic trade."

Under the title "Export Notes," the Iron Age of January 16, 1902, says:

"Business with Porto Rico has been better right along since the tariff was taken off, giving the merchants free trade with the United States. American gold is in circulation altogether, and the stable character of the currency has greatly improved the situation. While Porto Rico has ceased to be foreign, there is still some diversity in the range of prices made by American manufacturers, some of which make no difference in quotations, although not putting purchases for that country on an export basis. Others have made their prices uniform with those for the domestic trade."

REPUBLICANS NOT SINCERE.

When the Republican party and a Republican President announce their opposition to the trusts, as a proof of sincerity we ask for a recommendation from the Executive that all or some of the articles selling abroad cheaper than at home be forthwith put upon the free list, and that a bill be reported from the Ways and Means Committee to this effect. And when this Congress shall have adjourned, and not one of these articles shall have been put upon the free list, and not one tariff schedule reduced, then the American people will understand and rightly value these specious pretensions.

The wife of the American farmer is compelled to use a sewing machine in her home, produced by an American factory, which costs nearly twice as much as the same machine sold the housewife of Mexico or South America. The blue rim of the mountain from which the sleeping ore is extracted may shadow the very lintels of his door; the smoke of the foundry where the crude material is fashioned into shape may float over and rest upon the furrows in his field, yet he must pay more for the plow which came from the mountain and the factory than the Russian peasant on the banks of the Danube or the German burgher on the banks of the Rhine.

$100 REWARD FOR EXPORT PRICE LISTS.

A man in the employ of the Democratic Congressional committee spent many months trying to get hold of some of the special discount sheets of leading export houses. By having friendly manufacturers write to agents in foreign countries, and under various other pretexts, he succeeded in obtaining the export price lists of half a dozen of the 200 exporting houses in New York.

Being told by friends in exporting houses that the prices quoted in the export price lists were usually not bottom prices and that special discount sheets gave the lowest quotations, this employee of the Democratic committee made many vain attempts to obtain one of these sheets. He employed manufacturers and others well acquainted with exporters, to visit their offices and to obtain, if possible, one or more of these special discount sheets. Time and again he was told, "Oh, yes, I can get it for you; I have known those people for years. I'm certain they will let me have it." But, although he would concoct a plausible reason for asking for the sheet and would strain his friendship almost to the breaking point, yet in every instance this friend of the employee would have to admit defeat, though he might get a squint at the coveted sheet. He would be told, "Yes, we know you are all right and will not make improper use of the sheet, but it is a rule, rigidly enforced, not to let one of these sheets go out of our office, except to mail to certain trusted foreign agents. We wouldn't let it go out of this office for love or money. It might make endless trouble for us." Or he might be told, "I should be very glad to accommodate you, but those sheets are under lock and key and I have not the key."

Failing to obtain the sheet in ordinary ways, the committee's agent got permission to advertise offering a reward for it. But, to his astonishment, five of the leading papers of New York refused to print the advertisement. The managers admitted that it was a perfectly legitimate advertisement, but said they did not care to publish it. In one case the manager figured on the amount of advertising space used by the exporting houses and which might be lost should he "slap them in the face" by printing the advertisement.

Finally the publication of the following advertisement was secured in the New York World of July 11, 1902:

$100 REWARD!

"One hundred dollars will be paid for the special discount sheet (any month in 1902) to accompany Henry W. Peabody's export price list. Twenty-five dollars will be paid for similar sheet of other leading export houses. Foreign correspondence solicited; answers will be considered strictly confidential. The Democratic Congressional committee wishes these sheets to demonstrate the very great difference between the home market and export prices charged by our protected manufacturers. Address Literary Bureau, Democratic Congressional Committee, Bliss Building, Washington, D. C."

A month later the Democratic Congressional committee received from a foreign country a copy of the special discount sheet advertised for and also a copy of Peabody's Export Journal to match it. The following are photographic reproductions of this sheet and of small parts of the Export Journal, both dated May 17, 1902:

American Price Current, revised and corrected to date for the Exporters and Importers' Journal from exchange quotations and ruling export cash prices supplied by manufacturers.

This Price Current of American and foreign products and manufactures is published in behalf of exporters, importers and manufacturers. By reference to its columns American manufacturers can compare their goods with those illustrated and priced and adapted to and sold in foreign countries. Importers will find it of great service in making up their indents for American merchandise. Its discount sheet is exclusively for the use of foreign buyers, and only accompanies the foreign edition of this journal. All others desiring discounts from list prices printed can secure same from exporters, importers, jobbers, or direct from the manufacturers.

[Prices quoted are for goods delivered at New York, unless otherwise specified. For discounts see discount sheet, in foreign edition only, dated May 17, 1902.]

The following reproductions are from other leading export journals for which the committee has no discount sheets. The prices quoted are lower than the home prices for these same goods, but are not the real export prices. According to statements made by editors of export journals and by those in the business, the quoted prices are seldom or never as low as are actual export prices.

The few days intervening between the receipt of the special discount sheet and the publication of this campaign book and the very great difficulty in obtaining the exact American wholesale prices on the identical articles to match the export prices makes it impossible to publish a long list of comparative export and domestic prices. The following list is based largely upon the prices quoted in these export journals and sheets and also partly upon other data, some of which is contained in this book:

[a] 25 per cent off for export.

In explanation of a few items in the above table it may be said that some of the American prices are taken from the Iron Age of May 22, 1902. Not all of the prices quoted are for May, but all or nearly all are for the year 1902, and there is every reason for supposing that similar prices and differences existed in May.

The export prices on heavy steel goods like rails, billets, structural materials, etc., are not contained in the table, partly for the reason that exact prices are not known and partly for the reason that the present home demand in these lines is such that our manufacturers are not just now bidding for export business. They are, however, filling orders at prices from 20 to 40 per cent below home prices and are undoubtedly securing some new orders, especially in bridge material. It should be remembered that the pools and price agreements on rails, billets, sheets, plates, structural work, etc., are not in force on export goods and our manufacturers usually compete freely in foreign countries The blessings of competition are still enjoyed by foreigners even when dealing with protected manufacturers.

Facts in regard to the export prices of lead were given in the Oil, Paint and Drug Reporter of December 30, 1901, and in the testimony of Mr. John M. Peters before the Ways and Means Committee on April 2, 1902.

On the same day Mr. A. G. Webster, president of the New England Shoe Association, testified that leather was sold for export 5 to 10 per cent below domestic prices.

Letters in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 23, 1902, page 7763, give the prices of steel armor wire.

The price of rubber insulated wire for export is from a letter from a Providence firm to a New York firm.

The prices of carbide were those prevailing last February. It is probable that the carbide trust (the Union Carbide Company) is exported at $43 a ton, the export price of the Canadian manufacturers, who are also charging $70 at home.

The prices on typewriting machines are obtained from a reliable man in New York City, who says the cost of manufacturing the Remington machine is only $14, although the office and selling expenses add about $25, making a total of $40 for all costs and leaving $60 as the profits on each machine sold to an American customer.

An employee in a big exporting house says that nearly all kinds of clocks are sold for export at one-half the price charged here. He specified certain of the Ansonia clocks.

The following from Arkell & Douglas's South African market report of February 1, 1902, is authority for some export prices:

BARB AND PLAIN WIRES.

"* * * Present price on barb wire, 12 gauge regular, is $2.30, with usual discount of 2 per cent. * * * The price for annealed varnished wire is $1.35 for 6 to 9 gauge, and galvanized $1.65 per 100 pounds, both exact weights, nested in carload lots."

SUGAR.

"The market is steady and we quote to-day cut loaf or crushed 5.10 cents, granulated 5.60 cents, cube 4.85 cents per pound. Prices are subject to a discount of 1 and 1 per cent, and also drawback of about 1⅛ cents per pound. The refiners are now taking off the drawback themselves and invoicing the sugar at a special price, which is more than equivalent to a reduction of 1⅛ cents. They appear to object to giving us the details as to how the special prices are made when placing orders, but it is lower than formerly."

NAILS.

"The price of nails is easier, and we quote to-day $1.80 per keg in carload lots of 300 kegs or more, this price being for the basis sizes of 20 to 60 pennyweight. Wire nails are now $1.40 per 100 pounds."

BORAX 7¾ CENTS IN AMERICA, 2⅛ IN ENGLAND; DUTY 5 CENTS.

The present price of American borax in England is obtained from Mr. Ernest L. Fleming, an importing manufacturer and exporter of borax, soda, etc., of Weaverham, Cheshire, England. Mr. Fleming was accused of attempting to defraud the Government by importing borax (duty 5 cents per pound) as "washing crystal" (duty 25 per cent or about one-quarter cent per pound). He came to this country to test the matter, and in July, 1902, was arrested, tried, and exonerated of the charge. He was greatly astonished to see the close connection here between the Government and the trusts. In fact, he could scarcely distinguish between the two. In his letter of August 15, 1902, to the Democratic Congressional committee, he says:

"The present price of borax (refined) in England is 2⅛ cents a pound. In America it is 7¾ cents per pound—just the difference of the tariff, 5 cents per pound. Hundreds of carloads in the United States are used every week, no less than sixty-six different trades being dependent, more or less, on this one article. The trust makes $1,250,000 profit per annum out of the people of the United States. * * * The trust controls millions of tons of borax and borate material in the United States, although the consumption in the United States is only 10,000 tons per annum, and if competition were allowed by the Government, the people could have the stuff at 2 cents per pound. In their frantic efforts to preserve the profit, the trust resorted to the arrest of myself. On Wednesday, the 16th of July, 1902, I was arrested at the Federal Building, New York, in the office of the United States assistant district attorney, Baldwin, immediately after a conference between Zabriskie & Anderson, representatives of the borax trust, with the assistant district attorney. I have a letter to my brother showing that the arrest was made in accordance with orders direct from Washington by the borax trust. The United States district attorney, Baldwin, said he was acting under instructions from Washington. At the examination of the case at the appraisers' stores on Thursday, the 10th of July, Doctor Jacobi and his assistant, borax trust's chemists, were present. During the three days' trial, Zabriskie, the borax trust representative, sat at the elbow of the United States assistant district attorney constantly prompting him and egging him on to do his best to convict."

EXPORT PRICES ON BARBED WIRE.

The export prices of barbed wire are contained in a letter printed in the Iron Age of June 12, 1902, signed "C.," and dated May 30, 1902, at Warrington, England. It is in part as follows:

"It is quite true that markets which were entirely possessed by us until the last few years have now been taken from us by your countrymen and by Germany. But there is no ignorance of the causes which, in the majority of instances, have brought this about. To give a concrete example, which is worth reams of explanation, the following market reports will tell their own tale:

"Melbourne, April 12th ult.—American quotations f. o. b. New York. Annealed drawn varnished fence wire £6 10s. 8d. per ton (clearly a long ton to suit that market).

"Pittsburg, April 11.—Shortage of steel still continues. Wire rods $36 per (short) ton. (This is equal to £8 7s. 3d. per long ton.)

"Your issue under notice reports the continued shortage of steel in the United States. Thus rods have advanced another $1 a ton since April 12, and all wire has advanced so that, e. g., barb fence galvanized is being sold in carloads at the high figure of $2.90 per 100 pounds, Pittsburg, and in smaller than car lots at $3.10 per 100 pounds. Translate the former into long tons and sterling, and it equals 13s. 6d. per hundredweight, or £13 10s. per long ton, which your home consumers are called upon to pay for galvanized barb wire.

"I have before me, however, a quotation from your great company, dated May 26, of £10 7s. 6d. for a parcel of 90 tons f. o. b. New York, to be shipped abroad. You will perceive that your citizens subscribe through your tariff to give the foreigner his fence wire at $9 per ton less than the price of the raw material, and his barb wire for 30 per cent less than they can buy it themselves, at the same time that they secure to the manufacturer his home profit on the transaction."

Although Mr. C. was mistaken in thinking that wire rods are quoted here in short tons, yet his quotations on barb wire are undoubtedly correct.

ALL KINDS OF EXPORT PRICES.

Of course, there is no reason for supposing that the export prices quoted in the above table are bottom export prices. As stated in the article on the steel and wire trust, there are all kinds of export prices. While Canadians get lower prices on our goods than our own countrymen, yet they do not get as low prices as are quoted to more remote foreigners. From statements in the export journals (see under Sewing Machines on cover of this book, for example) it appears that the Australian and South African markets get lower prices than the West Indies, and that consumers in Mexico and Canada are less favored than are the Australasians. In fact, some of our trusts have different prices to customers in different States. Thus window glass is sold cheaper to go to New England or to the Pacific coast than at the factories in Pittsburg for delivery on the next block. Salt and other articles are similarly sold.

In certain instances our manufacturers give an extra discount, over ordinary export prices, equal to the tariff duty in the country to which the exported goods are to go. This discount, however, does not appear to be general, and is usually limited to 25 per cent or less.

GOODS FOR EXPORT DIVERTED TO THE HOME MARKET.

All kinds of attempts are made by Americans to obtain as low prices on our manufactured goods as are obtained habitually by foreigners. The Iron Age of January 9, 1902, contains a letter, signed "Manufacturer," which explains one of the devices for defrauding (?) our manufacturers. He says:

"There is a practice more or less prevalent among a certain class of exporters, to which I have seen no reference in your columns, but which, for the interests of your manufacturing subscribers, should be thoroughly exploited. I refer to the practice of purchasing goods for export, but actually intended for sale and consumption in the United States.

"There is a class of morally irresponsible exporters who take advantage of such a condition to purchase for export, and divert their purchases to the domestic market at cut prices, thus disturbing market conditions and inflicting injury upon the manufacturer. The methods adopted in securing the goods are many and devious, the latest of which, I have been informed, would do credit to the childlike innocence of the proverbial Chinaman.

"A street broker, with no standing in the trade, solicits and takes orders from jobbers at cut prices. These orders are turned over to an exporter of questionable standing, who in turn hands them to an exporter of fair standing, to be passed by him to the manufacturer. Of course, the form of adopting marks and names of port of destination is preserved between the exporters, and they appear on the orders and cases, these marks indicating a destination which will pass the scrutiny of the manufacturer when he receives the order.

"I am informed that additional precautions against discovery are taken when high-priced goods are desired, even to the extent of actually having them shipped to a European free port and returned duty free by an agent in the free port.

"I am also informed that in the event of a manufacturer tracing the irregularities, a cloak is used by his customer to hide his interest in the scheme, the claim being made that he simply financed the middle exporter in the transaction, having no knowledge of the irregularity.

"I should like to see a full discussion on this subject, believing the evil to be greater than commonly supposed."

As bearing further upon this point, the following is from a pamphlet, entitled "Some Export Trade Humbugs," published by the American Exporter, New York:

"It is by no means unusual for goods turned over to the publishers with the understanding that they are to be 'for export only,' and even after being delivered to steamship companies, to subsequently turn up in the domestic market, much to the annoyance and prejudice of the manufacturer. Sometimes the advertiser finds that these goods have been sold to his own consumers in competition with himself, and at greatly less than his regular prices."

As a rule, however, the Americans, or at least that part of them who do not prefer high prices, have not been successful in defeating the ends of the trusts and in obtaining goods at reduced or foreign prices. While a majority of our citizens believe in high prices, and keep a high tariff wall around us, all of us are at the mercy of our protected trusts and must pay, as gracefully as possible, whatever prices they may care to charge us.

THE UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION.

BOTH A PRINCE AND A PAUPER—THE STEEL TRUST—ITS COLOSSAL PROPORTIONS—IT TERRORIZES FOREIGNERS WHILE CRYING FOR THE MILK OF PROTECTION AT HOME—OF ITS NET PROFITS OF $111,000,000 OVER $73,000,000 ARE TARIFF PROFITS—ITS PRODUCTS SOLD IN FOREIGN MARKETS AT TWO-THIRDS OF HOME-MARKET PRICES—WIRE ROPE SOLD FOR EXPORT AT LESS THAN HALF THE DOMESTIC PRICE—THE TARIFF ON STEEL GOODS A HANDICAP TO MANY STEEL-CONSUMING INDUSTRIES—ITS REMOVAL WOULD SQUEEZE THE WATER OUT OF THE TRUST'S CAPITAL AND LIFT A GREAT BURDEN FROM MANY SMALL MANUFACTURERS.

Andrew Carnegie has said that steel is either a prince or a pauper. He might well have said that the United States Steel Corporation is at one and the same time the greatest prince of industries and the greatest of paupers.

Unquestionably our billion-dollar steel trust is the prince of industries. Not only is its capitalization ($1,450,000,000) higher than is that of any other single industry, but it controls, through ownership of stock and "community of interest," many other important iron and steel industries, which add about $250,000,000 to the capital controlled. Through its pooling and price-fixing agreements with competing concerns manufacturing rails, structural steel, steel plates, steel sheets, steel billets, steel bars, wire rope, etc., perhaps $200,000,000 more capital is brought under control, making almost a $2,000,000,000 steel trust.

Disregarding its alliances and affiliations, the value of the trust's yearly product of steel is about $410,000,000, its first year's profits over $111,000,000, and its yearly wage roll about $113,000,000, or $712 each for its 158,263 employees. In many lines, such as wire, tin plate, and bridges, the trust is at present practically the only producer. According to the testimony of its president, it owns 80 per cent of the iron-ore mines of the Lake Superior region, nearly all of the 60,000 acres of Connellsville coking-coal mines, 1,000 miles of railroads, transports its ore on its own vessels, and produces about 75 per cent of our entire output of steel. Besides, it is by far the largest body of financial water in the world. The estimates on the amount of water vary from $500,000,000 to $1,100,000,000, it being difficult to distinguish between the water of the preferred and the fog of the common stock.

These facts, with its reputed million-dollar-a-year president, make it easily the prince of industries. That it is a dictatorial, domineering prince appears to be the opinion of those in charge of the thousands of manufacturing industries in which steel is a raw material, and which exist only at the mercy of the great trust, which dictates prices, terms, and conditions under which these industries may do business. In the language of one of the men in the industry, "The steel trust is 'it' in the steel world just at present."

Like most real princes, this steel trust disregards and defies laws that it does not see fit to make over. It was formed openly and by the concerted action of the shareholders of the selling companies with the intent, effect, power, and tendency to restrain and suppress competition and to create a monopoly. Hence it is clearly illegal under the Sherman antitrust law and under the laws of many of the States in which it does business. It is also, as Prof. H. L. Wilgus, of the University of Michigan, has clearly shown, a trust in the original sense of the word, because it holds, as a trustee, the shares of the various constituent companies and votes for directors of the constituent concerns. Such trusts have been declared illegal in the nation and in some States.

That this price of industries is also the greatest pauper on earth is an "easy proposition." Surely an industry that receives governmental aid to the extent of $70,000,000, or $80,000,000 a year has no equal as a pauper. This seems to be a fair estimate of the amount of tariff benefits which it is now obtaining from this country. For, as the Portland Oregonian says, "Abroad it is a colossus striking terror to the hearts of British, German, and Russian manufacturers; at home it is an infant industry crying for the milk of protection."

An idea of the extent of the benefit of the tariff to this great trust can be formed from a comparison of the domestic and export prices of its goods, as well as from importations of competing goods.

President Charles M. Schwab admitted to the Industrial Commission last May that steel rails were exported at an average price of about $23 a ton, when the domestic price was $26 and $28. If he had been able to recall exact figures on specific foreign sales, he would undoubtedly have realized, what others say confidentially, that the export price during the previous four years averaged $7 or $8 below the domestic price.

As the average difference between the domestic and export prices of steel rails is $7 to $8 per ton, it is evident that practically all of the duty of $7.84 per ton is utilized by the trust and affords it so much extra profit. The duty enables the steel-rail pool to hold up American railroads, and through them the whole American people who use the roads, and compel them to put about $18,000,000 a year into the trust's pockets. The United States Steel Corporation produced 1,675,628 tons of rails for the year ending March 31, 1902, and its share of the tariff "swag" at $7 per ton is $11,729,396. As the actual cost of producing steel rails is now estimated by experts to be about $14 per ton, the absurdity of any duty on steel rails, except to enable the trust to extort from us, is apparent.

About 600,000 tons of structural steel were produced last year, nearly all of which was sold at home at prices fixed by the beam pool. These prices averaged about $12 per ton above the prices at which considerable quantities of beams were exported. Thus the duty of $11.20 per ton on beams mulcts us about $6,000,000 a year. At $10 per ton $4,895,060 goes to the Steel Corporation.

The trust produced 9,066,000 boxes, or 404,746 tons, of tin plate last year. As the trust sells tin plate to exporting manufacturers at $1 below its domestic price of $4.19 per box at New York, it is clear that at least two-thirds of the duty of 1¼ cents per pound yielded profits, and surplus tariff profits, to the trust. At $25 per ton the tariff gives $10,118,625 to our great 1-year-old infant.

The average domestic price of wire nails in 1901 was $2.41 per keg. About one-tenth of our output of 9,000,000 kegs was exported at an average price of about $1.45 per keg of 100 pounds. The duty of one-half cent per pound all goes to increase trust profits, which would be large even under free trade. As the steel trust makes about 400,000 tons of our wire nails, this foolish duty adds $4,000,000 a year to this trust's profits.

The average domestic price of barb wire was $3.04 and the export price about $2.20 per 100 pounds in 1901. The duty of 1¼ cents per pound is at least half "velvet" to the steel trust, which produces all of our 300,000 tons of barb wire. This tariff "velvet" amounts to $4,200,000 a year.

The trust produced 378,838 tons of other wire and wire products, which sold for at least $20 per ton more because of the duties of from 1¼ to 2 cents per pound. Here are $7,576,760 more of gratis tariff profits to our giant steel pauper.

It is worthy of note that the great steel trust (as a part of the wire-rope pool) sells wire rope for export at considerably less than half what it charges home consumers. Although the duty on wire rope varies from $2.40 to $3.50 per 100 pounds, which amounts to about 100 per cent on the price of American rope in Europe, yet we import large quantities of English rope and sell it here at a profit, after paying duties, freight, and other charges.

The trust produced 693,655 tons of tubular goods. These sold for $5,549,240 more in our markets because of the duty of two-fifths of a cent per pound. This is only one-third of the net profits of the National Tube Company, which are said to have averaged over $1,000,000 a month.

The following table shows the estimates of the effective duties on the products of the trust:

That these estimates are conservative is evident from the fact that we were importing and exporting many kinds of iron and steel goods last year and that generally domestic prices were near the import point. The tariff, therefore, is responsible for about two-thirds of the first year's profits of our greatest trust. The tariff then burdens smaller industries with taxes amounting to over $70,000,000 a year, and turns the proceeds over to this giant monopoly. Not only this, but because this trust's products are sold cheaper to foreigners, this tariff tax puts all our steel-consuming industries at a disadvantage with foreign competitors. Hundreds of small industries, handicapped in this way, are having the life crushed out of them by this tariff juggernaut. They are dying hard, and are forming manufacturers' free-trade and reciprocity leagues, and are yelling desperately at Congress to take the duties off steel goods and to stop the progress of the tariff monster. Meantime the wise men at Washington are saying, "Statesmen, spare the tariff; touch not a single schedule."

Without this tariff profit the trust's earnings, even in good years, would not exceed $40,000,000. As the interest on the first bonds ($301,000,000) makes a fixed charge of $15,000,000 a year, there would be left but $25,000,000 for dividends on the stock, all of which is water. After the second bonds ($250,000,000) are issued, there would be left but $12,500,000 for dividends. In ordinary years there would be nothing for dividends, and in bad years the holders of the second issue of bonds would probably have to reorganize the trust. But for the patent and mining monopolies, which would still be left, Mr. Carnegie, as holder of the first bonds, might reasonably expect to find himself again a steel manufacturer.

That the tariff does nothing for the laborers is evident. The total wages paid was $112,829,198, or $713 per earner per year. The net profits were $111,067,195, or $702 per earner per year. Thus the earner produced $4 a day and got only $2. Had there been no tariff, prices would have been lower at home, more goods would have been sold, more labor would have been employed to make them, and, as demand for labor usually fixes wages, the average wages would have been higher. The only important effect of the removal of the tariff duties, then, would be in reduced dividends on the watered stock and perhaps in the more modest demeanor of some of our steel magnates in American and European gaming resorts.

If tariff duties remain unchanged, this trust will continue to plunder the people of millions of dollars every month, though it may be compelled to absorb several more companies to hold its monopoly. The great profits in most lines of steel manufacture are tempting outside capital to build competing plants wherever competition is possible. This is especially true of structural material and of tin plates. Expert tin-plate men say that by next fall there will be sufficient mills outside of the trust to produce half of the tin plates consumed in this country. Independent mills would now be producing considerable quantities of tin plate if they could obtain steel bars. They have sent a man to Europe to buy bars there. They expect to be able to obtain bars of outside concerns next summer; and as the trust has recently stopped subsidizing the makers of tin-plate mills, and has left them free to sell to outsiders, the tin-plate monopoly is not as strong as it has been. The Engineering News of March 27 thus sums up the situation as regards this great trust:

"Very likely the steel trust and its competitors will form pools to restrict production and maintain prices as long as possible, and further consolidations may take place. So long as these abnormal prices and profits continue, however, so long will there be found men ready to build works which can either be run so as to pay for themselves in a very few years, or else can be sold to the trust at a large advance on their cost. The trust can not indefinitely pursue the plan of buying out its competitors at an abnormal price and watering its securities to pay the bill. Some time the process of dilution must come to an end.

"Even if it were possible, moreover, for the United States Steel Corporation to maintain an absolute monopoly, it is not believable that the public would long endure such a condition. The public opposition to the huge consolidation has by no means been removed. It has only been temporarily disarmed, partly by the fact that the monopoly has not yet made use of its power to interfere with the natural course of prices, as determined by the law of supply and demand, and partly by the knowledge that outside competition has by no means been eliminated from the steel industry. If these conditions change, the public will certainly find means to protect itself."

Will the unprotected worm ever turn?

(For full details of concerns in and out of this trust; for testimony of Charles M. Schwab; for discussion on the illegality of the trust, by Prof. H. L. Wilgus, etc., see following pages.)

PRESIDENT SCHWAB'S TESTIMONY—VALUE OF ASSETS OF THE UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION.

[From affidavit of Charles M. Schwab, July 15, 1902, in suit in Newark, N. J., to prevent the proposed retirement of $200,000,000 of preferred stock and the issuance of bonds instead.]

The net earnings during the first three months of second year, viz, from April 1, 1902, were $37,691,700, or at the rate of $150,766,000 per year.

In my opinion, the net earnings of the second year of the steel corporation's business, ending April 1, 1903, will greatly exceed those of the first year, and will equal and will probably exceed $1,400,000,000.

During the second year the properties are earning at the rate of over 14 per cent upon the common stock, after deducting 7 per cent cumulative dividend upon its preferred stock.

The properties owned and represented by the United States Steel Corporation are of enormous value, and many of them are indispensable for the successful conduct of the business and could not be duplicated in the United States or elsewhere at any price.

The following items of value are, in my opinion, substantially below the actual value of the properties to the United States Steel Corporation: [a]

Iron and Bessemer ore properties	$700,000,000
Plants, mill fixtures, machinery equipment, tools, and real estate	300,000,000
Coal and coke fields (87,589 acres)	100,000,000
Transportation properties, including railroads (1,467 miles), terminals, docks, ships (112), equipment (23,185 cars and 428 locomotives), etc	80,000,000
Blast furnaces	48,000,000
Natural-gas fields	20,000,000
Limestone properties	4,000,000
Cash and cash assets, as of June 1, 1902	148,291,000
Total	1,400,291,000

The foregoing items of value do not include any allowance for the value of the good will and established business of the various plants and properties, nor do they include anything for the very valuable patents, trade-marks, and processes owned or controlled, or anything for the large amount of orders for manufactured goods which have been actually received and are in process of filling. These orders amount in the aggregate to about $150,000,000, and will keep the various producing mills and plants fully occupied until after the 1st of January, 1903, and now assure a net profit of over $60,000,000.

In explanation of the items of valuation, Mr. Schwab goes into details. He declares that it is his opinion that the iron and Bessemer ore properties are practically inexhaustible, and that the valuation of $700,000,000 is conservative and must increase very materially with the exhaustion of the known Bessemer ore deposits. As to the plants, etc., valued at $300,000,000, in Mr. Schwab's estimate, his affidavit goes on to say that the corporation includes 400 producing mills, many of them the most valuable in the world.

The coal and coke properties, valued by Mr. Schwab at $100,000,000, he says have that value, although not yet fully developed.

"These properties comprise 54,269 acres of coking coal and 33,320 acres of steam coal, making a total of 87,589 acres, situated in the best coal regions of the United States and within easy access by economical transportation facilities to the producing mills."

Mr. Schwab further declares that his valuation of the transportation properties is made after deducting the bonded indebtedness of $40,340,000 held against the various properties, and he avers that the properties could not be duplicated for less than $120,000,000.

[a] It would be interesting to learn on how much value the steel trust pays taxes. The little information at hand indicates that the assessed value of the coking-coal lands is less than $5,000,000, and probably less than $3,000,000. The assessed value of its iron-ore properties is probably less than one-seventh of Mr. Schwab's sworn value.

The blast furnaces, natural-gas fields, and limestone properties, Mr. Schwab declares, are estimated in his table at considerably less than the amount for which they could be duplicated. The cash assets, Mr. Schwab declares further, can not be duplicated at less than $200,000,000.

RELATION BETWEEN EXPORT AND DOMESTIC PRICES.

Extracts from the testimony of Mr. Charles M. Schwab, president of the United States Steel Corporation, before the Industrial Commission, May 11, 1901. (See XIII, pp. 448-487 of Reports.)

Q. Will you take up the question for a moment of the relation between export prices and the prices in this country? You have, perhaps, heard some of the discussion.—A. I heard some of the discussion of the gentleman who just preceded me. I do not quite agree with him, of course. It is quite true, as he says, that export prices are made at a very much lower rate than those here; but there is no one who has been a manufacturer for any length of time who will not tell you that the reason he sold, even at a loss, was to run his works full and steady. That has been the chief thing regarding all these companies in their export business.

I think you may safely say this, that where large export business is done, for example in the line of iron and steel, nearly all the people from whom supplies are bought for that purpose give you a good price for the materials that go into export. Railroads will in most instances carry them a little cheaper for you, and so on all down the line. But labor, within my knowledge, at least, has never been asked to work for a lower price for export material, so that labor benefits more by it than almost any other interest. As this book goes to press, the numerus lodges of the Amalgamated Iron and Steel Workers are voting on a proposition from the American Tin Plate Company (a part of the great steel trust, of which Mr. Schwab is president). This trust asks the workingmen to accept a reduction of 25 per cent in their wages when working on tin plate for export. It is stated that this reduction in wages will enable the trust to meet the prices of the Welsh tin-plate manufacturers (about $1.40 per box below the ordinary price of $4.19 charged by the trust), and to fill a big order for 1,500,000 boxes from the Standard Oil Company.

Q. Is it a fact generally true of all exporters in this country that they do sell at lower prices in foreign markets than they do in the home market?—A. That is true, perfectly true. I just want to interrupt you and say that American steel has been sold in the American market at as low prices in times of extreme depression as it has been in foreign markets, but it has been sold without profit. You know we do run for a space of time at a loss.

Q. Would you say that when business is in a normal condition the export prices are regularly somewhat lower than home prices?—A. Oh, yes; always.

Q. (By Mr. JENKS.) I should like to go back for a moment to the question of export prices. You said that during last year the export price was considerably lower than the price in the United States. Would you mind giving us definite figures?—A. I have not them at hand, but it would vary with each article.

Q. Suppose you take the case of steel rails. Could you give us about the difference between the export and domestic prices?—A. I would have to make a guess; I do not know definitely. The export price was about $23 a ton.

Q. And the price here?—A. Was $26 and $28.

Q. At the same time?—A. At the same time.

Q. In making these export prices are the export prices at all uniform or do they vary?—A. They vary with the competition we may have.

PERCENTAGE OF STEEL INDUSTRY CONTROLLED BY THE UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION.

Q. You spoke of the per cent of the steel industry that the Carnegie Company controlled. Could you give the Commission about the per cent of the whole steel industry that the United States Steel Company controls?—A. Well, yes; I think it is between 65 and 75 per cent. It will vary with times. I think in very prosperous times the percentage will be smaller; in very dull times it will be very much larger.

Q. Would you consider that per cent sufficient to make what would be called a monopoly of the business?—A. No; I do not think so.

PROTECTIVE TARIFF DESIRABLE ON HIGHLY FINISHED STEEL PRODUCTS.

Q. Now, will you take up for a moment the relation of the tariff to the export price?—A. Yes, if you would like, if you will ask me the questions.

Q. You are exporting at the present time large quantities of steel?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you think that the protective tariff on steel is any longer desirable?—A. I do, especially in certain lines. You take the lines of steel manufacture in which labor forms the larger part of the cost, and you must have a protective tariff or reduce your labor. Now, on lines of steel in which labor does not form an important part, it is perhaps safe to say we have reached a point where we do not need the tariff. Let us take the question of billets, for example. The cost of billets over pig iron or over ore, whichever you choose, as far as labor is concerned, is very slight. But you take the question of rails or tin plate and the highly finished articles in which labor forms a very important element of cost and remove the tariff and you lose the trade or you reduce your labor. That is such a simple proposition to me. Now, what do we export? We are not exporting tin plate to-day. Why? Because we simply have not the advantages of manufacture. Our labor is too highly paid to enable us to do that. But we do export largely rails and billets, because labor does not form the important part there that it does in the higher forms of manufacture.

Q. (By Mr. LITCHMAN.) Your opinion is that a reduction of the tariff means a reduction in labor?—A. It does where labor forms the important part of the cost. It has been a singular thing that the lines in which we have exported have been the lines in which the least labor is expended.

Q. Does that statement apply to skilled or unskilled labor?—A. Oh, all classes, but especially skilled labor; but I could safely say all classes of labor. This is what has been rather remarkable. You have seen in most discussions of this question that Americans have been able to export largely by reason of their superior facilities for manufacturing; but if you will stop to think of it, the large export has been done chiefly in those lines in which labor has not played an important part, like rails, billets, and things of that sort. [Not only is Mr. Schwab clearly mistaken as to manufactured exports in general, but he is greatly mistaken as to his own industry.]

The following figures are from the Statistical Abstract of 1901:

EFFECT OF THE REMOVAL OF THE TARIFF ON ORE.

Q. (By Mr. C. J. HARRIS.) Would it injure your business at all if iron ores were admitted free of duty here?—A. I think not.

Q. (By Mr. JENKS.) You have no objections to the removal of the duty on ore?—A. I think that is practically the case now. I think that is practically the case for this reason, that materials imported for finishing that are ultimately exported have the tariff rebated on them. Any manufacturer of steel will probably export enough finished steel to get his rebate on the imported ores, so there is practically that condition now.

PRESENT AND FORMER LABOR CONDITIONS AT THE CARNEGIE PLANT.

Q. Can you go somewhat into detail and contrast the present with the preceding conditions, in order to explain the significance of that statement?—A. Well, up to 1892 we had labor organizations. Since 1892 we have had none.

Q. Before 1892 about what proportion of your workingmen were union men?—A. Well, it varied each year; I should say along about 1899, 80 per cent. Oh, nearly all our work was under the control of organized labor, but just what percentage of the workingmen were not in the organization I am unable to say. It was not a very large percentage, probably not over 20 per cent of the total.

ORGANIZATION OF LABOR SOMETIMES A DETRIMENT TO INDUSTRY.

Q. Did you find that the rules of the organization limited the output of the individual men?—A. Yes.

Q. To a detrimental extent?—A. Yes. In speaking before the British Iron and Steel Institute a few years ago, I said that I thought one of the two chief reasons why England could not compete with America was because of the unreasonable rules followed by their organized labor, primarily. I remember a comparison at that time showed that the output of the same machines there was only about one-third of what it was in America.

Q. And that lesser output, you think, was due to the influence of organized labor?—A. Of course; the fact that the capital in your plant is producing one-third of what it could produce adds very much more to the cost of production, although not much to the wages of the men.

Q. You thought the lessening of the output was due to the rules of the union?—A. That was due to the rules of the union.

LABOR ORGANIZATIONS ARE DETRIMENTAL TO THE LABORERS.

Q. (By Mr. LITCHMAN.) Are you not likely to have an acquaintance with organized labor in the immediate future?—A. Quite probably. But still, I do not think I shall. I think that will fall to the lot of the presidents of the subsidiary concerns.—A. If I were a workingman, now, in one of these mills, especially if managed under the broad policy under which I hope the steel manufacture is administered, I would not want to belong to a labor organization. It puts all men, no matter what their ability, in the same class of work on exactly the same level. If I were a better workman—quicker, smarter—than the other men I would want to reap the benefit. I would not want to be put in the same class as the poorer man, which they must do. If we have 500 men employed at the same class of labor, the wages paid will be the same—must be the same paid to the same class. The level is that of the poorest man in that department. As a workingman I would not advance, and I would not be able to show superior ability over another if I were in an organization. That is my own personal view.

CAPITALIZATION—PROPORTION OF TANGIBLE ASSETS.

Q. (By Mr. JENKS.) I should like to go back to the question of capitalization for a moment. In the case of the United States Steel Corporation, about what proportion of the capitalization could be counted as tangible assets?—A. It is entirely a question of what you put in your raw materials at. If I were valuing the raw materials in this capitalization, it would not be big enough.

Q. Do you refer to the ore mines?—A. To ore, coking coals, and things like that. I claim that they are of much more value than people as a rule have ever given to them. This company, for example, has over 500,000,000 tons of ore in sight in the Northwest. Now, it does not take many dollars per ton on that ore alone to equal the capitalization of these concerns. We own something like 60,000 acres of Connellsville coal. There is no more Connellsville coal. You could not buy it for $60,000 an acre. Now, it depends altogether upon the value you put on that raw material as to what your capital ought to be.

THE PROBABLE DURATION OF THE CONNELLSVILLE COAL SUPPLY.

Q. (By Mr. PHILLIPS.) How long do you think, at the present rate, will be required to use up the Connellsville coal?—A. If manufacture increases in the future—if the consumption of steel increases in the future like it has in the past, I believe the Connellsville coal will be exhausted in thirty years. If the consumption of iron ore in the Northwest goes on as it has in the past, the ore now known will not last very long—some sixty years.

Q. (By Mr. C. J. HARRIS.) The amount of Connellsville coal you have in sight would probably be largely increased by future developments.—A. There is none to develop. Of course, there are other coals; but it is a well-known fact that the Connellsville coking coal is an ideal coking coal for manufacturing purposes. Now, the Connellsville coal field is very clearly defined and every acre of it is highly prized, and that is owned by all the companies in toto. Now, there must be developments of coal in other directions, but nothing like this coal. Hence, very much depends on the value you put on the raw materials.

PROPOSED REPEAL OF THE TARIFF ON CERTAIN STEEL PRODUCTS WOULD INJURE LABOR.

Q. Has your attention been called to the bill introduced in Congress by Mr. Babcock, of Wisconsin?—A. What was that? I do not recall it now.

Q. That was a bill to repeal all duties on steel goods produced by the trust, as commonly called.—A. Oh, yes; I know in a general way. I do not see that that would do anybody any good. It would not hurt anybody in those lines where we do not need a tariff, and the only persons it would hurt in those lines where we do are the working people.

Q. (By Mr. PHILLIPS.) Still there is not so much labor employed on steel rails or billets as on finer products?—A. No; and, therefore, the reason for a duty on the finer products is so apparent.

Q. (By Mr. CLARKE.) Do you know of any reason why the duties should be taken from the finished products of steel mills and not from the ore?—A. As I explained before, that is an impracticable problem, for the reason that the ores—speaking as a broad question—are not imported. They are all domestic. Hence, the taking of the duties off the ores cuts no extensive figure in the cost of making steel. It is not a practical question. Those who do bring in ore get the rebate on the finished product when shipped out, and it is practically free ore.

Q. Is it your opinion that there is anything in the conditions of business in this country at the present time which calls for an early revision of the tariff?—A. I do not think so. I should like to see it left alone. That is my personal opinion. I think it is unwise to disturb these things when there is no necessity for doing it. The tariff on rails and billets is not enough to hurt, if you are not bringing them in. It may be inconsistent, but that is a point of view I am not prepared to discuss.

CAPITALIZATION OF THE UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION.

Q. How do you account for the large difference between the capitalization of the United States Steel Corporation (as it now stands capitalized) and the capitalization of the constituent companies, exclusive of the bonds issued in payment?—A. There is not a very wide difference if you come to think it all over. All of these companies have added considerably to their assets since they were organized.

Then I undoubtedly think that the coming together of all these interests, the owning of these stocks by one corporation, will undoubtedly enhance the value of them all, for the reasons I have given in the line of economies, etc. I think, furthermore, that the values placed on raw materials in the shape of ores and coal have never been excessive, and the amount of capitalization depends entirely upon the value at which you put these ores.

VALUE OF THE ORE SUPPLY AS AN ELEMENT OF CAPITALIZATION.

Q. (By Mr. JENKS.) This added value that comes from the fact that the quantity of ore is limited is, of course, a sort of monopoly value—not using the word in an invidious sense?—A. You have seen, in your own experience, how this increased value of ore comes from the limited quantity. Individuals may own a mine and they may think it is worth ten times as much as it was ten years ago; and they are probably right, because they see a wonderful development in the industry in this country. It is a natural increase in value, just as real estate will increase in value because of its scarcity and the need for it.

Q. And this high capitalization you yourself justify on the ground that owing to the limited supply of ore its value must have been greatly increased?—A. I think so. I do not say that is the only reason for the capitalization, but you can fix the capitalization at a much larger figure, dependent on the value you place on the ore in the ground. After all, it is the greatest asset of all. Works can be duplicated, but this ore can not.

VALUE OF ORE IN THE GROUND AS AN ELEMENT OF CAPITALIZATION.

Q. You said, if I remember right, that the United States Steel Corporation has 500,000,000 tons of ore in sight in the Northwest?—A. Yes.

Q. Is it fair to suppose that the 500,000,000 tons of ore might fairly go in at some considerable price per ton in the capitalization of the combination? Of course, ore may, let us say, be worth $4 a ton; and, of course, at that rate it would be worth $2,000,000,000, obviously; but I suppose you ought to take, ought you not, the net profit that can be made in mining that ore in basing its value for capital stock?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, for a good many years, don't you suppose a fair estimate on profit of ore from Lake Superior mines would be 25 cents a ton?—A. I should not like to sell ore at 25 cents profit.

Q. How much higher?—A. I should say one ought to have a profit of $2 to $2.50 a ton for every ton of ore in the Lake Superior region.

Q. (By Mr. PHILLIPS.) Who should receive the benefit of that?—A. The owners of the ore.

Q. (By Mr. STIMSON.) There are a great many mines which have been running successfully for many years at much less profit?—A. Yes.

Q. As small as 25 cents?—A. Yes; and sometimes at a loss.

Q. Are you willing to make a guess on the average rate of profit on mining land?—A. No; because no one can do it—you can put the ore in at what you like.

CONTROL WHICH THE UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION HAS OVER LABOR.

Q. I understand, of course, you can not go into the future of the steel combination with labor, but I should like to know whether the result of the combination of all the furnaces is not to make it possible, if the United States Steel Corporation so wishes, to suppress and labor dispute at any one furnace or mill very much more easily than it could have been done before?—A. Now, that is a question pretty difficult to answer.

Q. But does not the corporation add very much to the power of an employer as a whole against any particular class of employees?—A. I think it does.

POOLS IN STEEL AND OTHER INDUSTRIES.

Q. (By Mr. JENKS.) You spoke in reply to one of the earlier questions to the effect that there were sometimes apparently agreements between the officers of the different competing companies, so that they sold at the same rates, Pittsburg and Chicago, to certain places. Will you speak briefly with reference to previous pools as they existed before the organization of this company?—A. The steel-rail pools, as so called, were simply agreements between the managers of the various works to sell steel rails at the same price at the same point.

Q. For manufacturers, before the organization of the United States Steel Corporation, were similar agreements existing?—A. Yes; in all lines of business; not only in steel, but in everything else. There were similar agreements, known as "joint agreements," to maintain prices. They have existed in all lines of business as long as I can remember.

Q. Without any distribution?—A. There were sometimes questions as to distribution of territory.

WATERED CAPITAL.

[From the testimony of Byron W. Holt before the Industrial Commission, May 10, 1901.]

The original capital of the United States Steel Corporation consisted of $304,000,000 of bonds, $425,000,000 common stock, and $425,000,000 preferred stock. This was issued to exchange for the stocks and bonds of the eight companies in the original combination and for $25,000,000 in cash. Since then $72,355,280 of common and $70,828,890 of preferred stock has been authorized and is in process of issue.

This makes a total of $1,297,184,170 of stocks and bonds to be exchanged for a total of $894,988,800 of stocks and bonds of the constituent companies. Thus the new capitalization exceeds the old by $402,195,370, or an increase of 45 per cent. A fair estimate of the value of the actual assets of the old companies, aside from their special privilege of monopoly powers, was that two-thirds of their capital was water. As the consolidation of these companies has added nothing except $25,000,000 cash and an increased monopoly power to the value of these consolidated companies, it is fair to say that the actual visible assets of the United States Steel Corporation are only about $300,000,000, or the amount of its bonds, and that all of both kinds of stock is what is commonly called water. That is, the visible assets constitute 25 per cent and the invisible assets 75 per cent of the value of this great corporation, according to its capitalization. That this estimate is not a wild one is probable from the statistics of the census for 1890, grossly inaccurate though they probably are. These show that the total capital then invested in the iron and steel industry was only $414,000,000. Supposing that the capital invested has since increased 46 per cent, it would now be about $600,000,000. (The actual figures since given for 1900 were $580,041,710.) The trust probably does not control more than 40 per cent of the capital invested, for there are many lines of goods which it does not touch. Add to its iron and steel holdings $60,000,000 for the actual value of its other holdings, and the sum will not much exceed $300,000,000. In this estimate no allowance is made for "good will."

GREEDY IRON AND STEEL TRUSTS REBUKED BY REPUBLICAN OFFICIAL REPORTS.

The iron and steel trusts had become so high handed by 1900 that the Republican Administration thought best (both to try to disconnect itself from the trusts in the minds of the people, and to begin the sandbagging process, later continued by Chairman Babcock, to obtain campaign funds) to read the riot act to these trusts, and to call upon them, under penalty of having their tariff support removed, to stop their vicious practices of selling goods at high prices in the home market while charging much lower prices for export. The following quotations are from a special article on iron and steel in the August, 1900, report of the Bureau of Statistics on commerce and finance:

"The progress of work on shipbuilding in the United States has likewise been retarded, because makers of steel materials required a higher price from the American consumers than they did from the foreign consumers for substantially similar products. Of course American exporters have to get foreign contracts in competition with foreign plate makers who are excluded from our domestic market. In addition to this, American export plate makers are interested in preventing the establishment of plate manufacturing in their customer nations abroad, and to that end bid low enough to discourage foreign nations from entering the field for producing their own plate at home. The progress of domestic manufactures of iron and steel goods may likewise be handicapped by the sale of iron and steel in their manufactured state at so much lower a price to foreigners than to domestic consumers as to keep the American competitor out of foreign markets generally. The natural limit to such a policy of maintaining a higher level of prices for these materials at home than abroad is found in the restriction of domestic consumption and the import duty. If restriction of consumption at home does not operate to prevent the shortsighted policy of discrimination against domestic development of manufacturing industries, the other contingency is more or less sure to rise, namely, the demand for the reduction of the tariff on unfinished iron and steel, in order to equalize the opportunity of makers of finished products in foreign markets. To this policy the domestic consumer is usually ready to lend himself, thus making a powerful combination of interests to set limits to the rise of domestic prices of iron and steel materials.

"Of the two policies open to iron and steel makers, the farsighted one of keeping the domestic and foreign markets as near as possible on a par in the price of these materials of manufacture seems by far the wiser one to follow, both in the interest of a steadier course of prices, which means steadier consumption, and on account of the competition of manufacturers of finished goods with foreign manufacturers in the neutral markets of the world.

"The other policy of maintaining prices to manufacturers at the highest level at home leaves little margin for experiment in seeking new markets, and restricts the application of iron and steel to additional uses at home. The depressing effects of an agitation for tariff revision to remedy this inequality are sure to cause a far greater business loss, not only to the country as a whole, but to the producers of iron and steel themselves, than is to be gained by selling at low prices abroad, which they can not help, and at high prices at home, which they can help. Nor can the home-market price be sustained beyond certain limits by export sales. Certain American manufacturers of steel materials tried this policy up to April, 1900. It resulted in a very positive shrinkage in domestic consumption at the then high rates. Farmers had ceased to purchase barbed wire for wire fences, retail hardware dealers had complained for months of diminished business in nails and wire. Jobbers had gotten in the way of doing a hand-to-mouth business on prices that had advanced from $1.35 to $3.20 in the course of a year. Hence the reduction of $1 in April, 1900, became a necessity in order to keep the mills in operation.

"When new markets are to be opened abroad, the governing factor which must be made the basis of prices to consumers is the capacity to undersell competitors, regardless of the level of prices at home. The policy of many governments has been to subsidize production or distribution in some way or other, so as to enable the producer to reach the consumer in distant lands without too great a loss or risk in the initial outlay. The capital outlay being large and the income low for the first few years, the risks of changing prices, of uncertain credit, and of the cost of marketing, give the whole policy of opening foreign markets a highly experimental character. The elements of commercial expense in distribution between producers and foreign consumers are not only higher, but they are harder to ascertain in advance than in the case of domestic distribution. Hence commercial expansion arising from the necessity of disposing of a national surplus abroad has always made it necessary for domestic producers to adjust their trade to two price standards—world-market level of prices, determined primarily by international competition, and the domestic standard of prices, determined mainly by the development of internal demand. The higher profit, presumably, to the producer is made in the home market.

"The policy of premiums, bounties, and subsidies to foreign trade tends to delay economies of production and of distribution in domestic markets, to increase the difference between prices to domestic and foreign consumers, and to restrain domestic consumption, as in the case of beet sugar in Europe.

"There is something economically impossible in the policy of trade syndicates to attempt to sell as dear as possible at home and as cheap as possible abroad, and yet expect to develop a home market as the bulwark of national prosperity. Yet this is exactly the position of Germany to-day. The completeness with which the iron and steel trades are committed to this course and the results already apparent in depressing these industries there should warn those who are responsible for the policy of these industries in the United States."

If steel rails, for example, sell at Pittsburg for $35 per ton for months in succession for home consumption, while the foreign consumer is purchasing them for $22 to $24 per ton, the domestic market is sure to order no more than it is obliged to have for the time being.

ILLEGALITY OF STEEL TRUST—EXTRACTS FROM "A STUDY OF THE UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION IN ITS INDUSTRIAL AND LEGAL ASPECTS."

[By Horace L. Wilgus, professor of the law of torts and private corporations, University of Michigan, 1901.]

In connection with the petition of the Anti-Trust League, the attention of the Attorney-General is called to the lectures of Professor Wilgus in the volume above named, and particularly to the following extracts from the same: First, as to the legality of the United States Steel Corporation; second, as to the lawful power of the States over the subject; third, as to the jurisdiction of the National Government over the subject; fourth, State antitrust laws; fifth, the national antitrust law; sixth, as to the repeal of tariff schedules which shelter trusts.

1. "Is it an illegal trust? This depends upon two things, (1) its substance and (2) its form.

"(1) As to substance. A recent definition of a trust is, 'any combination, whether of producers or vendors of a commodity, for the purpose of controlling prices and suppressing competition.' All contracts, agreements, and schemes whereby those who are competitors combine to regulate prices are 'trusts.' A somewhat fuller definition is the one given by Mr. S. C. T. Dodd, the attorney for the Standard Oil Company (and if anybody ought to know from experience, he should). He says it 'embraces every act, agreement, or combination of persons or capital believed to be done, made, or formed with the intent, effect, power, or tendency to monopolize business, restrain or interfere with competitive trade, or to fix, influence, or increase the price of commodities.' It will be noted that neither of these definitions says anything as to form. So far as the form is concerned, that is immaterial. It is the purpose and tendency that are emphasized. It is not necessary that prices be actually increased or that competition in fact is prevented. It is the purpose and the power that are the essential elements. 'The test is whether the contract or combination in its apparent purpose or natural consequences places such restrictions upon competition as tends to create a monopoly.' From the review we have taken of the industrial side of the United States Steel Corporation, and waiving all questions of form, it is reasonably certain that it is a combination made with the intent, effect, power, and tendency to restrain competition in the iron and steel business.

"(2) Does the form of organization—the corporate form—prevent it from being illegal? As we have just said, the form is not made part of the approved definitions, and by the decisions of many of the courts it is held that the forms will be looked through and the substance considered. And although the form is corporate and apparently legal, that this will not purge the illegality of the purpose. In Illinois, where corporations can be formed for any lawful purpose, it was held that a gas company, formed for manufacturing gas and acquiring the shares and property of other gas companies, was illegal when the shares were acquired for the purpose of controlling these other companies, in order to prevent competition and create a monopoly in the business; and this, too, when the express power to acquire such shares was contained in the articles of incorporation. Substantially the same view has been taken in several of the States, and by the Supreme Court of the United States, which says: 'It is not within the general powers of a corporation to purchase the stock of corporations for the purpose of controlling their management, unless express permission be given them so to do.'

"The United States Steel Corporation is expressly given the power to acquire and hold shares of stock in other corporations, and vote upon them, as any other owner is. It is, therefore, undoubtedly legal in all particulars in New Jersey, and would be so declared by the courts of that State, and of some of the other States having a like policy. But we must remember that 'every power which a corporation exercises in another State depends for its validity upon the laws of the sovereignty in which it is exercised,' and 'subject to the laws and Constitution of the United States, full power and control over its territories, its citizens, and its business belong to the State.'

"The holding of the court by the official syllabus in the Standard Oil Company case (State v. Standard Oil Company, 49 Ohio State Reports, p. 137) is that—

"'An agreement by which a majority of the stockholders in several companies transfer to trustees, who are required to hold the stock in trust for the transferers and to exercise the power of controlling the affairs of the companies which the legal ownership of the majority of the stock confers, in such a manner as will be most conducive of the interests of all parties to the agreement, tends to establish a virtual monopoly of the business for which the companies were organized, and is therefore contrary to public policy and void.'

"How did it happen that the Standard Oil trust was unlawful when every single step taken in its formation was legal? The reason was clear—that the purpose was to form a monopoly and suppress competition; that the trustees understood this, and that the shareholders did also, and that it was the same as any other contract for creating a monopoly—that is, unenforceable. But no statute then provided for punishing either the shareholders or the trustees. Can the courts come to any other conclusion as to the United States Steel Corporation? It understands why it was formed—for the purpose of preventing competition. Those who sold their shares to it understood this also; they knew it was for the same purpose. There are therefore no innocent parties here any more than in the other case, and if either party was trying to enforce this contract for the purchase of shares, the courts certainly would be bound to hold them unenforceable if the question was properly raised. How, then, does the case differ from the Standard Oil case? The answer is, that it is in the remedy. In the sugar and oil cases the companies, X, Y, and Z, had no express right to sell out their property and management to any person, or place it in the hands of trustees other than those selected in the ordinary way, and the court held that although each shareholder had the undoubted right to put his shares in trust or sell them outright, the concerted action of all the shareholders was just the same as if the corporation itself had abdicated its own powers of self-management, and that this is a corporate sin, for which the State could take the corporate life of X, Y, and Z companies, and could enjoin the further carrying out of the trust.

"But it will be said in the case of the United States Steel Corporation the corporate sin of abdicating the power of self-management by the constituent steel companies is not present, because all of them have express authority to dispose of all their shares at one time to any other corporation which wishes to become a real shareholder, and therefore such a sale and purchase is sinless, whatever the purpose may be. Such a claim can not be sustained. Even in the State that grants such power, if it is exercised for a purpose that is unlawful—I. e., to create a monopoly—its exercise will be, or ought to be, held unlawful.

"In the Standard Oil case the corporations were enjoined from carrying out the trust agreement within the State. This remedy is available in any State where the offending corporation may be doing business, and this remedy is available against anyone, trustee, shareholder, corporation, owner, or anyone else, that is a party to the offense; and furthermore no State can confer any power, by whatever form it legalizes it, upon any group of persons or any individual that will legally authorize it or him to do or continue doing in any State what the laws of that State forbid—and the forms will be swept away and the substance looked at. If these views are correct, it is not unlikely that in the States having a policy forbidding the creation of trusts and monopolies the courts will hold it to be an illegal trust within even the strict meaning of that term.

2. "It is within the lawful power of the State to prevent by any remedy it may provide the use, within its territory, by any person of any property in any way which it shall declare to be injurious to the public welfare.

3. "So far as the United States Steel Corporation buys and sells goods of any kind that are to cross the State lines, it is, so far as these transactions are concerned, beyond the jurisdiction of the States and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Government.

"The corporation proposes to engage in transportation also between States. This brings it within the jurisdiction of the National Government, at least so far as those persons are concerned who actually carry on this business for it.

4. "The States of New York, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the National Government have had antitrust acts.

MICHIGAN ACT.

"In Michigan the attorney-general is directed to bring quo warranto proceedings against any offending corporation organized in the State, for the forfeiture of its charter. He shall also bring proper proceedings, either quo warranto or injunction, against any offending foreign corporation 'exercising any of the powers, franchises, or functions of a corporation in this State.'

"Any violation of the law is declared to be a conspiracy against trade, and any person who may become engaged in any such conspiracy, or take part therein, or aid or advise in its commission, or shall, as principal, manager, director, agent, servant, or employee, or in any other capacity, knowingly carry out any of the stipulations, purposes, prices, or rates, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $5,000, or be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than one year, or both.

THE NATIONAL ACT.

5. "The national act of 1890 created seven different crimes relating to interstate, foreign, or territorial trade or commerce, punishable by a penalty not exceding $5,000 or one year's imprisonment, or both, by providing that every person who shall make (1) a contract in restraint of such trade, or (2) engage in a combination in form of a trust or otherwise, or (3) in a conspiracy in restraint of such trade, or (4) monopolize, or (5) attempt to monopolize, or (6) combine, or (7) conspire to monopolize such trade, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, to be punished as stated. An injured party can sue for damages, and the combination can be enjoined at the suit of the United States district attorneys. The courts give the common-law meanings to the terms used, but the statute converts the things designated into crimes."

6. As to the tariff, Professor Wilgus says:

"Great monopolies have been built up without its help; others have been fostered and sustained by it. Since a protective tariff is justifiable only to promote the general welfare, it should be withheld or withdrawn whenever it can be used to subvert that end."

As to the remedy proposed by the Republicans in the Fifty-sixth Congress, May 21, 1900 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 6262), in a joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to empower Congress to pass laws regulating and controlling trusts and monopolies, Professor Wilgus says:

"If it is possible to avoid this, I think it should be avoided, for such an amendment would seriously disturb the balance of power between the nation and the States, and would be a tremendous untried and unknown power in the national hands. It should be resorted to only when all others fail."

(See elsewhere "Trusts—the Record of the Two Parties on the Subject.")

The foregoing are the larger competitors of the Steel Corporation. There are, of course, others in the field, but they are either not as large as the above or have not yet completed their plants. At present many of the large companies in the above list are working in harmony with the Steel Corporation as to prices, etc. Thus, according to capitalization (outstanding), about 77 per cent of the iron and steel industry of the United States is owned or controlled by the great Steel Corporation.

THE TIN PLATE TRUST.

Partly because the protectionists consider the tin-plate industry in this country as the product of protection, and because it is a model and well-developed tariff trust, I will begin with this branch of the great Steel Corporation. Certainly, if the protectionists have a case anywhere it is in the tin-plate industry.

TIN-PLATE INDUSTRY HAS COST US $100,000,000.

In the first place, it is instructive to inquire how much American consumers have paid in the last ten years in order that this industry should be established.

The duty on imported tin plate was 1 cent per pound previous to July 1, 1891; then 2.2 cents until October 1, 1894; then 1.2 cents until July 24, 1897; since then, 1.5 cents per pound.

I have a table here showing the total pounds of tin plate used, imported and domestic produced, the price per pound of foreign plates in bond, the New York prices of American tin plate, and a column showing the difference between these two prices.

The price of imported plates in bond at New York is obtained by adding one-tenth cent per pound to the foreign or invoice price, as given in the "Statistical Abstract." This amount covers transportation charges. The New York price is the actual price at which Bessemer coke 14 by 20 tin plate sold in New York in each year. The difference column shows how much more the wholesale buyer paid for tin plates in New York than he would have paid had there been no duty.

Rebates on reexported tin plates in manufactured forms (the exact figures are not attainable) reduce this total to between $90,000,000 and $95,000,000 as the direct cost in the last ten years of "creating" the industry. This is the extra amount paid by wholesale dealers and metal workers; but by the time they were repaid by the American people, who ultimately bought the goods and footed the bills, the addition of legitimate profits swelled the amount to over $100,000,000.

Our people paid this for a competitive industry which promised to put prices down. They got for their money a monopoly which arbitrarily marks them up.

TRUST FORMED—FOUR-FIFTHS WATER.

In 1898 the industry was well on its feet and capable of existing without tariff support. In November of that year the price at the mills in Pittsburg had fallen to $2.65 per box, which was within 5 cents of the price of foreign plates in New York, without duty.

During 1898 negotiations were begun to form a company that should control all the plates of the country. These negotiations were finally successful, and in December the trust was launched under the laws of New Jersey, as the "American Tin Plate Company."

It was capitalized at $50,000,000—$20,000,000 preferred and $30,000,000 common stock. It contained about 40 plants and 280 mills. The total cost of duplicating these mills in 1898 (about $20,000 per mill) was not more than $6,000,000. The value of the real estate purchased and the cash with which the trust began business probably made the actual value of the assets of the company at its foundation between $10,000,000 and $12,000,000. The price paid for these plants is said to have been $18,000,000 of common and $18,000,000 of preferred stock.

While this company may not be legally a trust, in the original sense of the word, its executive committee is cleverly constructed to perform the work of actual trustees. The members can not be removed by the board of directors and have almost absolute control. Stockholders can not examine the books of the company.

TARIFF MONOPOLY PROFITS PROMISED.

This trust now owns practically every mill in the country making tin plates for the general trade.

To maintain its monopoly it has five-year agreements with the six or eight manufacturers of tin-plate machinery which prevent them from making mills for outsiders. It is therefore nearly impossible for outsiders to obtain the necessary equipment for tin-plate plants. Furthermore, the trust, even before the formation of the United States Steel Corporation, was so interlocked with the other trusts which produced tin-plate bars that it is doubtful if any real competitor could have obtained bars and other raw materials. Thus the National Steel Company (capital $59,000,000) was organized in the interests of the American Tin Plate Company and for the purpose of controlling the production of tin-plate bars.

When the trust was being formed, in November, 1898, what were said to be conservative and carefully prepared estimates of sales, earnings, and profits for 1898 were made public. These estimates were as follows:

The gross output of mills was stated to be 7,633,556 boxes. On the basis of the then operating expenses a profit of 35 cents a box, or $2,671,754, was made by the mills when prices of tin plates were lowest. Under the new arrangement the operating expenses were to be reduced by $1,000,000, making a total estimated profit of $3,671,754. After deducting $1,260,000 for dividends on the preferred stock, $2,441,754 would be left for dividends on the common stock.

TRUST PUT UP PRICES FROM $2.80 TO $4.84.

When these estimates were published tin plate was selling at $2.65 at the mills, or $2.80 in New York, for 100-pound boxes.

Not only did the trust advance prices immediately, but in March, four months after the trust was formed, it had them within one-fifth of a cent a pound of the importing point, the duty being 1⅛ cents. The trust raised prices at the mills on July 14 to $4.37½, and again on August 26 to $4.65. Although this then made the price at New York 30 cents under the importing price for 100-pound plates, it was so near the importing price for 80-pound plates that the trust feared to mark prices up again at that time.

ADVANCE WAS ARBITRARY AND NOT JUSTIFIABLE.

To what extent were the advances in price justified by the increased cost of raw materials? In the first place, it is not true, as often asserted in pro-trust papers, that the advances were caused by the increased cost of raw materials. On the contrary, the advances in price of tin plates preceded the advance in billets and tin. Thus, from November 15 to January 6, 1899, tin plate advanced 35 cents a box, while the rise in raw materials was only equal to about 14 cents. From November 15 to February 17 tin plates were marked up 85 cents, while the advance in raw materials was only 30 cents a box. From November 15 to March 8 plates were marked up $1.22½, less than half of which was explained by the prices of materials. From November 15 to October 6 tin-plate prices advanced just $2, although the advance in prices of raw materials justified a raise of only $1.55 or of $1.75 if, as the trust apologists claim, labor had advanced 20 cents a box. Thus it is clear that the trust advanced prices arbitrarily, and with more regard to the price at which foreign plates could be imported under a protective tariff than to the increased cost of Bessemer bars, themselves the product of another tariff trust, which also arbitrarily advanced prices.

TARIFF PROFITS OVER $4,000,000.

From careful estimates based on the stated profits of 1898, the profits of this trust in 1899 were not less than $4,650,000, even if the trust did not, as anticipated, save $1,000,000 by the trust method of production. The statement for 1900 shows total profits of $5,857,417, from which $1,500,000 was deducted for depreciation. While I do not believe that $4,357,417 is the full amount of profits that should be fairly credited to this trust, I shall accept these figures.

The tariff was most certainly responsible for all of this profit. In fact, the tariff on tin plate is probably responsible for much of the profits made by the National Steel Company and several of the companies which produce the raw material of this industry. As the trust, at least for part of the year, was supplying plates for export at about $1 a box below the quoted prices, it certainly did not need more than a duty of one-half cent per pound to protect it from foreign competition. That it utilized about all of the duty is evident from its prices, compared with the in-bond prices of English plates. That it did not show greater profits in 1900 is probably because of juggled bookkeeping or of some other kind of juggling which I do not pretend to understand. I will suppose that the tariff profits of this trust were $4,000,000.

$1 PER BOX TO FOREIGNERS.

Since May, 1901, the price of domestic tin plate has remained unchanged. The price of foreign plates has changed but slightly. The total imports in 1901 were 117,880,312 pounds and the trust's output about 750,000,000 pounds—the output in 1900 being only 677,969,600, instead of 750,000,000, as was estimated. It thus appears that the consumption of tinplate is declining in this rapidly growing country blessed with the greatest harvest ever known, and during what the Republicans tell us are times of unprecedented prosperity for all. High trust prices is the only explanation for this decrease.

Considerable quantities of tin plate are now being sold to cotton-oil and other companies manufacturing goods for export. The prices obtained for these plates are in some cases at least $1 below the regular domestic price. The Standard Oil Company now uses about two-thirds of all imported plates. It pays a duty of $1.50 per box, but gets back $1.48½ when the plates are exported as packages. The cost of getting the drawback duty is only 8 or 10 cents per box. If, then, the oil trust could obtain plates of the tin-plate trust at $1.40 per box below the American price, or, rather, at 10 cents above the in-bond price of foreign plates, it would use American plates. This is what the oil trust has offered to do. It has agreed to take 1,500,000 boxes of American plates at the price of Welsh plates plus about 20 cents for freight and other costs.

The tin-plate trust has accepted this large order, providing the tin-plate workers would accept a reduction of 25 per cent in their wages when working on this order. The workers in various States voted on this proposition in July and August, 1902, and refused to accept the cut.

SHUTTING DOWN MILLS TO COERCE WORKERS.

The following editorial from the New York Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin of August 11, 1902, describes the tactics of this $100,000,000 "infant" to beat down wages for the benefit of foreigners:

"Shutting down 129 of the 274 mills controlled by the Tin-Plate Trust looks like an attempt to coerce the men to accept a reduction of 25 per cent in their wages on the million and a half boxes it was proposed to make for the Standard Oil's foreign business, which now uses imported plates on which a drawback is allowed. The shutting down is stated to be due to a lack of trade, but it is hard to credit this. The men were assured that if they would accept a reduction of wages on this additional order there would be no reduction of wages on business for domestic consumption, and there would simply be just so much additional work for the mills. Many of the unions of tin workers voted for the reduction, but on the whole it was beaten, for the reason, it is alleged, that most of the tin workers are Welshmen and they have still some regard for their friends who did not come over, very many of whom would be thrown out of work if the Standard Oil bought those million and a half boxes in America. Probably some of the men were afraid to start a reduction of wages even on a special job. Immediately after the tin workers rejected the proposition, the shutdown of fifteen plants out of twenty-eight was ordered. Of course, the domestic demand may really be light, and the Standard Oil order may have been needed to keep all the plants open, but we have been getting very different sort of news from all branches of the iron and steel industry, and the makers are said to be offering tin plates for export at 25 per cent less than the domestic price."

If the trust had, during the last two years, been selling tin plates to Americans at the same price charged foreigners, the consumption of tin plates would probably have exceeded 1,000,000,000 pounds and the trust would have had work for all of its mills. It has held prices so very high that the profits have been about 100 per cent and have tempted capital into the business, so that by September, 1902, there will be enough mills outside of the trust to supply half of our consumption. These mills were unable to procure steel bars until this summer, and in fact had difficulty in finding men to construct mills. The monopoly of the trust is now broken until a new deal can be made taking in the outside concerns at fancy prices. Before this occurs we are likely to see much lower prices. After it occurs we will see higher prices again, unless in the meantime, the people recover their senses and abolish the tariff on tin plates.

THE AMERICAN STEEL AND WIRE COMPANY.

THIS TRUST RAISED PRICES OVER 100 PER CENT IN 1899—WIRE NAILS FOUR TIMES AS HIGH AS IN 1895—TRUST'S MONOPOLY ALMOST ABSOLUTE—ITS EXPORTS AT HALF THE AMERICAN PRICE—HELD PRICES SO HIGH HERE THAT FARMERS CEASED TO CONSUME AND PRICES WERE REDUCED 1 CENT PER POUND IN APRIL, 1900—JOHN W. GATES'S MILLIONS MOSTLY TARIFF PROFITS.

The American Steel and Wire Company is another of the companies that are now a part of the United States Steel Corporation. That it is leaning heavily on its tariff crutches in this country, and uses them as clubs to beat down its rivals in all other countries, is evident from facts, some of which were stated to this Commission by Mr. John W. Gates.

POOLING AGREEMENTS IN 1895.

Going no farther back than 1895 we find the Consolidated Steel and Wire Company, an Illinois corporation of 1892, with $4,000,000 capital, as the barbed wire trust, with Mr. John W. Gates as manager. Various pooling agreements were formed in 1894, 1895, and 1896 between all of the barbed wire manufacturers, but they were only temporarily successful in producing higher prices.

The Export Barbed Wire Association, composed of four principal exporters, was in force several years previous to 1895, and did much to steady prices. It was partially revived in 1896.

In September, October, and November, 1895, "prices were fixed by agreement," as the Iron Age stated, and were $2.85 per 100 pounds for barbed wire. The previous April the price was $1.90. The average prices for previous years were: 1894, $2.18; 1893, $2.55; 1892, $2.29; 1891, $2.72; 1890, $2.97. In December, 1895, the combination broke and prices fell to $2.

Early in 1895 wire nails were selling at a "base" price of 75 to 80 cents a keg in Pittsburg. In May two associations, one for cut and one for wire nails, got together and put this price up to $1.20. These associations pooled, and the wire-nail people "contributed financially to enable the Cut Nail Association to keep control of the market, especially in the payment of subsidies to keep idle the large number of cut-nail machines," as the Iron Age of December 3, 1896, tells us. The associations regulated the amount of nails offered for sale each month and the price at which they should be sold. Understandings were had with Canadian manufacturers. Nail-machine makers were subsidized not to sell to those outside the associations. Jobbers who did not cut prices were given rebates.

Prices advanced almost steadily for one year. By May, 1896, wire nails were selling at $2.70 per keg in Chicago and $2.55 in Pittsburg. The pool held together until December, 1896, when prices broke more than 1 cent per pound.

On December 3, 1896, the Iron Age said that high prices of cut and wire nails had reduced consumption from over 9,000,000 kegs in 1891 and 1892 to less than 8,000,000 in 1895, and in 1896 to probably far less than in 1895, notwithstanding the fact that a large amount of nails had been exported into foreign countries at less than half the price that the American public paid for their nails.

EXPORT PRICE $1.30, HOME PRICE $2.70 FOR WIRE NAILS.

It is often difficult to ascertain the exact export prices. In November, 1896, however, it is a fact that the price to foreigners was $1.30, while the price to Americans was $2.70. At least one dealer bought a large quantity of nails at export prices, and, after shipping them to Amsterdam and back and paying freight and other charges both ways, made a handsome profit while underselling the trust in its own market. He, however, was boycotted by the trust, and was thereafter unable to buy nails at any price either as an American or as a foreigner. The exports for the fiscal year 1896 were 28,762,187 pounds.

TRUST, MONOPOLY, AND WATER.

Agreements were broken and patched up in 1897 and 1898. In April, 1898, the American Steel and Wire Company of Illinois was formed, with $24,000,000 capital. It contained fourteen mills, seven of which constituted the Consolidated Steel Wire Company, formed in 1892 with $4,000,000 capital. This trust was not large enough to fully regulate production and prices. It was swallowed up by the new American Steel and Wire Company, a New Jersey corporation, formed on January 13, 1899, with $90,000,000 capital, $40,000,000 of which is 7 per cent cumulative preferred stock. This trust includes practically all of the wire, wire rod and wire nail mills of the country. The value of the twenty-six plants and other property absorbed is about $20,000,000, which, even admitting the $18,000,000 other capital claimed, would leave over $50,000,000 of water. It owns its own sources of supply. Its monopoly conditions and advantages were thus set forth in March, 1899, by its president, Mr. John Lambert:

"It will not be necessary to make any further purchases, for the reason that we have all the producing capacity that we need. It has been our policy to so fortify ourselves that we are practically independent, or, if you please, to put ourselves in a position to take the ore from our mines, transport it in our vessels, convert it into pig iron in our own furnaces, roll it into steel billets in our own steel mills, roll it into iron rods in our own rod mills, and finish it in our mills into plain and barbed wire and all the different kinds of wire used, not only in the United States, but all other countries where wire is used. In this way we have succeeded, as we own one of the best ore mines in the Mesaba range. We have our own coke mines and coke furnaces, so that you will see that we start at the bottom and have all the profits that there are, from ore to finished material. Our business is entirely satisfactory and the company is doing very well."

The trust has a monopoly of the drawn and barbed wire business, but has considerable competition in woven fence wire. It also does a large business in copper wire and electrical goods and in fencing, poultry netting, baling wire, and bale tires.

The actual output in 1898 of all the plants now in the trust was:

Wire rods	net tons	826,840
Drawn wire	do	1,130,124
Barbed wire	do	275,918
Wire nails	kegs	6,551,737
Woven-wire fencing	miles	10,000

EFFECT UPON PRICES OF THE FORMATION OF THE TRUST.

The effect of this trust upon prices has been almost marvelous. The following tables of average monthly prices are from the Iron Age of January 4, 1901:

It should be noticed that these are the base prices of wire nails in carload lots. Because of "extras," due to sizes, the average price per keg is fully 60 cents more than those quoted above. Of course, the prices of small lots are still higher, and the retail prices, especially in remote districts, very much higher than for carload lots. The base price is fixed at Pittsburg and freights are added to all points of delivery. The Pittsburg price is now 33 cents lower than Chicago and New York prices, which are 5 cents below St. Louis prices. Wire nails have almost entirely replaced cut nails, which now sell for about 70 cents per keg less than wire nails.

PRICES TOO HIGH FOR FARMERS.

It may be noted that when this trust was first formed we heard a great deal from the trust theorists about the economic advantages and savings of great combinations. Thus Mr. Garrit H. Ten Broek, of St. Louis, as counsel for the company, announced that "the only effect on the market that I can see will be a possible slight lowering of prices because of this economy, and also a steadiness of prices for the future." There are still numerous pro-trust theorists prating about the blessings of trusts as if nearly all of the trusts had not, in practice, actually demonstrated that they are, under present conditions, all-around curses. The blessings so far are enjoyed only by those who got into the trusts on the "ground floor."

If the wire trust lowers prices it will do so only because of the removal or threatened removal of tariff duties, or because prices are too high to yield maximum profits. The Iron Age of November 30, 1899, contains six columns of interviews with hardware men in twenty-five States on "the effect of high prices on the demand for goods." Many dealers say that they expect to sell 25 or 30 per cent less goods in 1900 because of advanced prices. Many farmers are refusing to build fences with wire at high prices. A Maryland farmer said: "The price of wire is prohibitive. I shall go home and put the hands to work and make rail fence." The farmers are deferring the building of houses because of the increased prices of lumber, nails, glass, etc. They are buying nails by the pound instead of by the keg.

Finding from experience that prices were out of reach of the farmers, the trust in April reduced prices of all goods 1 cent per pound. Another 1 or 2 cents off would make prices reasonable.

MOST FAVORED FOREIGNERS ARE THOSE FARTHEST AWAY.

The duty on wire nails from 1890 to 1894 was from 2 to 4 cents per pound; from 1894 to 1897, 25 per cent; since 1897, one-half to 1 cent per pound.

The duty on barbed wire from 1890 to 1894 was six-tenths of a cent per pound; from 1894 to 1897, four-tenths of a cent per pound; since 1897, one and nine-twentieths of a cent per pound on galvanized wire.

The duties on other products of this trust are generally higher than those on wire nails.

Mr. Gates told your Commission that goods were sold lower to foreigners, but he failed to state the difference between the home and export prices. Late in 1899, when wire nails were being sold at from $3.10 to $3.53 per keg to Americans, large quantities were being exported at from $2.14 to $2.20. At the same time, when barbed wire was being sold to Americans at $3.67 to $4.13 per hundred pounds, it was sold to Canadians for $3.25 and to more remote foreigners at $2.20 per hundred.

On December 2, 1899, Canadian Hardware, a Montreal publication, said:

"Retail dealers in the United States pay $3.70 f. o. b. Cleveland for car lots for barbed wire and $3.80 for less than car lots, while the figures quoted to the retail trade in Canada is $3.25 f. o. b. Cleveland for car lots and $3.35 for less quantities. * * *

"Plain wire is quoted to the Canadian dealer $11 per ton lower than to the home dealer.

"The explanation of these differences in prices is that in the home market, on account of the high customs tariff, the United States manufacturer has a monopoly, while in catering for the Canadian trade he has to bring his prices down to a point that will keep out the product of British and German manufacturers."

PROFITS OF THE STEEL AND WIRE TRUST IN 1899 AND 1900.

The balance sheet of the steel and wire trust for 1899 shows net profits of $12,162,530. What part of this amount is due to the tariff it is impossible to say. Only a rough estimate is possible. About 700,000,000 pounds of wire nails were sold in 1899 in our home market. Perhaps at no time was the export price within 50 cents per hundred pounds of the American price. The average differences probably considerably exceeded one-half cent per pound, the minimum duty on wire nails. All of the duty, therefore, is utilized by the trust, and we paid $3,500,000 more for our wire nails in 1899 than we would have paid had there been no duty. Perhaps 400,000 tons of barbed wire were sold in 1899 at an advance over the export price of one-half of a cent per pound. The tariff on barbed wire then put $4,500,000 net profits into the pockets of Mr. John W. Gates and his business partners. On 400,000 net tons of drawn wire in various forms sold to Americans the duty of from 1¼ to 2 cents per pound was probably one-fourth utilized. Thus our bill for this wire was about $3,000,000 greater because of the tariff. Putting these items together, we get a total of about $11,000,000 as the cost to us and the profits to the trust of this needless protection.

CHUNKS OF WISDOM FROM STATESMAN GATES.

These profits in steel and wire now make up a part of the $140,000,000 a year profits of the great steel trust. It was these profits that are responsible for the rise and development of that dazzling financier and statesman, Mr. John W. Gates, whose career is evidently just begun. When this tariff-nurtured statesman was before the Industrial Commission on November 14, 1899, he stated without a blush:

That prices of wire nails, etc., had been doubled;
That he deprecated the necessity for such high prices;
That they were due to the high price of raw materials;
That his company exported 700 tons of wire a day;
That it furnished England with 60 per cent of her supply;
That goods were sold lower to foreigners;
That such prices were necessary "to hold outside trade;"
That not infrequently new plants were shut up and dismantled;
That this was done for "various reasons;"
That five plants had been closed;
That his company had a monopoly of the barbed-wire business;
That, therefore, higher prices were charged for these products;
That his company was making big profits;
That his company did not recognize labor unions as such;
That subsidies should be paid to steamship lines and to corporations with $5,000,000 or more capital;
That the Government should supervise all such corporations;
That he went to Europe to form a world trust;
That he proposed to increase prices $10 a ton if such a trust were formed;
That the Germans contemplated a $20 increase;
That the Germans wanted too big a share of business;
That Germany's bounty system was excellent;
That if it were applied here we should soon be doing 90 per cent of the iron and steel business of the world;
That the protective tariff had had much to do with building up the industry; and
That the continuance of the policy was necessary to the future prosperity of the industry.

Surely no patriotic American will think of abolishing a protective tariff that has fostered such a genius. Is it not clear that he is a product of our American system, and that the Government now owes him a living, and not a scrimpy one either?

THE WIRE ROPE TRUST.

SELLS GOODS ALL OVER THE REST OF THE WORLD FOR ONE-HALF OR ONE-THIRD THE PRICES CHARGED HERE—THIS TRUST PAID THE REPUBLICANS $100,000 IN 1896—FIXED THE DINGLEY TARIFF BILL TO SUIT IT—HAS BEEN ROBBING THE PEOPLE AND ENJOYING GREAT PROSPERITY EVER SINCE—BULLDOZES COMPETITORS AND CUSTOMERS—ITS ORDERS ARE OBEYED BY THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT—COPIES OF STEEL TRUST LETTERS SHOWING PRICES OF STEEL WIRE IN ENGLAND.

The almost criminal folly of the protective tariffs of to-day, and especially of the inexcusable tariff on iron and steel goods, is well illustrated by the wire rope trust.

The manufacturers of wire rope have for years had a "gentlemen's agreement" on prices, an agreement similar to that of the manufacturers of steel rails or of structural steel or of sheets or of most of the other products of the steel mills. The principal parties to this agreement, pool, or trust are John A. Roebling's Sons Company, Trenton, N. J.; Hazard Manufacturing Company, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.; Washburn & Moen Manufacturing Company, St. Louis, Mo.; Roderick & Bascom Rope Company, St. Louis, and the Williamsport Wire Company, Williamsport, Pa.

Realizing that the prices which can be got for wire rope depend largely upon the duty on wire rope, the members of this trust began in 1896 to sow seed for the big harvest of profits which they have been reaping since 1897. According to the statements of some of the members, they contributed $100,000 to the Republican campaign fund in 1896. At least if all contributed their pro rata shares, as did some of the members, the Republican Administration of 1897 was indebted to this trust in the sum of $100,000.

As the better grades of wire rope have always been and still are made largely from imported rods or wire (larger than No. 6), the trust wanted no increase on the duty on wire rods. None was made in the Dingley bill. The duty on wire rope, however, was increased by the amount of the increased duty on coated or galvanized wire. The trust was also permitted to continue to benefit by the unreasonable tariff which compelled importers of wire rope to pay the same rate of duty per pound on the central core of the rope as upon the wire of which the rope is composed. This central core usually consists of tarred jute or hemp, and is used only as a "former" around which to twist the ends. It has little or no value, but adds 5 to 10 per cent to the weight on which duty is assessed.

Having fixed up the Dingley bill to suit their tastes, they proceeded to reap their profits by putting prices at home up to the tariff limit, while lowering prices to foreigners, so that our rope is exported to every important foreign country, with the possible exception of England. As the duty on imported wire rope will average nearly 100 per cent, the trust charges domestic consumers more than twice what is charged foreigners for its goods.

The following table gives the prices in England of American wire and wire rope and the price of English wire and wire rope, and the American duty on it:

17	2.71	3.48	2.00	.20	2.20	1.00	3.20	4.13

Thus the price of American wire rope c. i. f. at Liverpool is but little more than the duty on English wire rope which is brought into America. As the products of English and American mills compete in England, at least potentially, and are quoted at practically the same prices, we see that the duty on the imported wire rope averages about 85 per cent. To get the cost of English wire rope in America we must add to the foreign cost the amount of the duty on the wire in the rope and add 10 per cent to the duty because of the weight of the central core. Adding 35 cents per hundred for freight, insurance, and other charges, and 10 per cent for profits, we have:

The cost per 100 pounds of English wire rope in the United States.

Gauge of wire.	Cost price Liverpool.	Duty on wire.	Duty on core.	Freight, etc.	Total and 10 per cent.
0 to 8	$2.59	$2.40	$0.24	$0.35	$3.14
14	3.48	2.70	.27	.35	7.48
17	4.13	3.20	.32	.35	8.80

As English wire rope competes freely in this country with American rope, the price of the American rope at the mills can not be less than the above cost of the English rope. Deducting 25 cents per 100 pounds from the price in England of American wire, as the cost for charges, insurance, and freight, we find the price for export of American rope, at the mills, to be $2.34, $3.23, and $3.88 per 100 pounds for the rope made of the above-mentioned sizes of wire. Putting these export prices alongside of the domestic price, we have:

Prices per 100 pounds American wire rope.

Gauge.	Export.	Domestic.	Difference.
0 to 8	$2.34	$6.14	$3.80
14	3.23	7.48	4.25
17	3.88	8.80	4.92

These figures make it certain that the trust can, by virtue of the protective tariff, charge its American customers considerably more than twice what it charges its foreign customers.

We shall now see that for reasons only partly accounted for by the tariff duties, the actual selling prices of American wire rope average two or three times as much to the home or domestic consumer as to the foreigner.

From the price list of John A. Roebling's Sons Company, we get the following prices for "transmission" or haulage rope, composed of six strands and a hemp center, seven wires to the strand. The prices are for Siemens-Martin steel rope. Ten per cent is added to these prices to get the prices of galvanized wire; 60 per cent is then deducted to get the lowest wholesale cash price to domestic consumers; although 45 and 12½ per cent is the recently reduced price to agents.

Bringing the English and American prices together in the following table, we can compare net cash prices in America and England. The American prices are obtained by deducting 60 per cent from the price list of John A. Roebling's Sons Company for galvanized transmission or haulage rope composed of six strands and a hemp center, seven wires to the strand. The ordinary discount to agents for this class of rope is only 40 and 12½ per cent. But as some agents get special discounts on some kinds of goods, which amount to 60 per cent net, I have taken this lowest possible price. The English prices are those quoted in a letter written April 10, 1902, by a leading English manufacturer to a New York dealer. They are for galvanized BB wire rope, six strands, each seven wires, and are f. o. b. Liverpool:

Prices of galvanized steel wire rope.

Here we see that even after the reductions made last spring the prices of ordinary galvanized steel wire rope are from 1.9 to 2½ times as high in America as in England, and yet American and English rope compete in both countries. If we deduct from the English price 25 cents per 100 pounds at the cost of getting American rope to foreign markets, we find that the actual export price of American rope must average only about one-third of the price charged our own consumers.

How much of the difference is accounted for by the tariff?

The duty on rope 4½ inches in circumference is not less than 2.4 cents per pound. As a foot of this rope weighs 3 pounds, the duty per foot is at least 7.2 cents. Adding this to the foreign price (7.44 cents) and allowing one-fourth of a cent per pound for freight, insurance, etc., we get the cost of 1 foot of this English rope in our American market as 15.39 cents. But the actual price of American rope of this kind and size is 18.92 cents, or 30 per cent more than the cost of laying down English rope in our markets, even after paying an import duty of over 90 per cent on the English price. In a similar way the cost, duty paid, of English rope 2½ inches in circumference in our markets is 5.58 cents, while the trust actually sells this rope at 6.16 per foot. The cost of English rope 2½ inches in circumference in our markets is 2.88, while the trust price here is 2.86 per foot.

Thus, apparently, our importers of English rope are, at present prices, making profits of from 10 to 30 per cent on the rope handled. Why do they not sell for somewhat smaller profits and soon either get the most of the orders or compel the trust to reduce its prices? There are numerous answers to this question, some of which can be fully appreciated only by our manufacturers and dealers in iron and steel goods.

CUSTOMS OFFICIALS TOOLS OF THE TRUST.

In the first place something must be deducted from the apparent profits, because the importers did not contribute $100,000 to elect the present Administration and are persona non grata to our customs officials.

According to the statements of importers of wire rope, the customs officials invariably advance the foreign cost price of goods imported, on which ad valorem duties are assessed, although the prices entered are actual purchase prices. Moreover, the United States Government sent a detective to England to learn the price paid by American importers. Although this detective had free access to the books of at least one English manufacturer, and found nothing that did not verify the invoice prices, yet the customs officials here continue to advance the invoice prices on goods imported by Americans.

In some cases the importers say that they make their invoice prices out higher than the actual prices paid, so that they will not be penalized, as they would be should the customs officials add more than 10 per cent to their invoice prices. Probably one-fourth of the importers' apparent profits are wiped out by the overzealousness of the customs department in serving the wire-rope trust.

In this unfair way the present Administration is increasing the protection of the wire-rope trust and rendering, for the second time, a quid pro quo for the campaign fund of the trust. The wire-rope trust appears to be getting a great deal for its money. It made a good investment of its $100,000 in 1896.

BULLDOZING TACTICS OF STEEL TRUST.

In the next place, it is not easy for the importers to find customers. Wire rope is usually only one of the materials or products, and a minor one, required in some construction job of work. It is important that the contractors obtain, when desired, all of the other and more important products. These they can be certain of obtaining only of very large dealers in all kinds of iron and steel goods, and at present practically only of the steel trust. The extent to which the steel trust is now putting the screws on manufacturers, merchants, and contractors who consume steel goods is not realized by the general public. If a manufacturer is dependent upon the steel trust for any one important material he can not obtain it unless he buys all of his materials of the trust, at least all that the trust can supply. Not only this, but in many instances the trust will prescribe the maximum prices at which, and the territory in which, this dependent manufacturer can sell his finished product, and the railroads over which his materials must be shipped; also, if he does not pay cash the trust will inform him through what bank he must finance his accounts, and give him other similar details of procedure to remind him of the new order of things and of his loss of independence.

Similar treatment is accorded to merchants and contractors. Practically, if not exactly, the steel trust says to its consumers: "Buy of us and only of us if you wish to continue to do business in this country." As the trust is practically the only producer of many important products, like wire, tin plate, etc., nearly all manufacturers, dealers, and contractors are at the mercy of the trust. Even if a contractor could get all of his materials for any one job outside of the trust, he does not dare offend it, for he has other contracts which require steel-trust products. The result is that he reluctantly submits to the trust's dictation. As a matter of fact, many manufacturers, dealers, and big contractors now look only to the trust for materials, and have ceased to obtain quotations from outsiders and foreigners. Thousands of such manufacturers and dealers are cursing the trust in an undertone, while openly submitting to its terms and exactions.

It is this state of affairs, due to the bulldozing tactics of the steel trust in the business world, that makes it possible for wire rope to sell in this country for two or three times the price in England, and for nearly twice the cost, duty paid, of English wire rope in this country. The wire-rope pool, it should be remembered, is now a part of the great steel trust, and gets the benefit of the power of the trust to dictate terms and hold up most of the steel-consuming industries. Its power comes largely from the tariff, not on any one article, but on all. If all other steel goods were on the free list the duty on wire rope would undoubtedly limit the power of the wire-rope combine to extort from the consumer. But all steel goods being protected by high tariff duties, the wire-rope trust can exact from its victims much more than the amount of the duty on wire rope—which illustrates the beauties of high tariffs on goods which we are exporting to all parts of the world.

WHY FOREIGNERS SHOULD BUILD OUR CABLES.

These differences in prices, for the home market and for export, charged by our highly protected wire-rope trust, furnish one of the best arguments in favor of a privately constructed as against a Government-built cable under the Pacific Ocean. The pretended patriots and friends of the Government, but who are actually the representatives of the trust, tell us that they "want an American cable, built by American capital, in American shops, by American wage-earners, laid by American ships, under the American flag." If these representatives of the trusts would say exactly what they mean, they would tell us that they "want our protected trusts to have no possible competitors in building the Pacific cable, in order that they can charge two or three prices for the cable, the same as they now charge ordinary Americans."

It is obvious that if our Government is to lay cables and to have them built in American mills, they will cost several times what would have to be paid for them in England by an ordinary company.

TRUST LETTERS GIVING EXPORT PRICES ON WIRE.

To show the extra cost of making wire rope in America from American wire, the following quotations are made from recent letters of the American Steel and Wire Company. These letters were written from the trust's London office and to an English manufacturer of wire rope:

"We have much pleasure in quoting you the following prices on lots of say 40 or 50 tons, our ordinary quality of galvanized plain wire and plain annealed core wire. We give you a full range of extras up to 36 gauge.

"Plain annealed coil wire, in catchweight coils, no wrapping, c. i. f. Liverpool, No. 0 to 8 gauge, £7 5 0, with the following extras over base for thinner sizes:

"On our ordinary quality of plain galvanized wire, we quote you a base price of from 5 to 8 gauge of £8 5 0, catchweight, coils, no wrapping, c. i. f. Liverpool with the following extras for thinner gauges:

Gauge.	Extra.	Gauge.	Extra.	Gauge.	Extra.	Gauge.	Extra.
	£ s. d.		£ s. d.		£ s. d.		£ s. d.
9	5 0 0	16	3 0 0	23	13 10 0	30	25 5 0
10	7 5 0	17	4 5 0	24	15 10 0	31	27 10 0

15	50 0 0	22	10 5 0	29	24 0 0	36	45 0 0

"Of course, on any sizes thinner than, say, 16-gauge, we would recommend some to be packed in paper and canvas, our extra charge for same being 14s. per ton, or if wrapped only in paper, our extra charge is 5s. per ton.

"We are in the habit of supplying both these qualities of wire to the decimal of an inch, and we have quite a reputation for supplying this material true to gauge.

"Our prices are on standard wire gauges—¼-gauges to take the price of the next thinner gauge.

"Terms: Two and one-half per cent discount, 30 days sight draft, with documents attached, on a London bank.

"We make you these quotations for prompt shipment and subject to your prompt reply, and hope to be favored with your valued order.

"For heavy galvanized wire we should require an extra of £1 1 10 per ton; therefore, this would make our base price, 5 to 8 gauge, £5 5 0 per ton, and the extras for finer gauges would be the same as quoted you on the 1st instant.

"Yours, faithfully,

"AMERICAN STEEL AND WIRE COMPANY,
"THOS. J. FARRALL, Manager."

Reducing these prices to American money, we get the following prices:

These prices do not include the discount of 2½ per cent for cash. Deducting 25 cents per 100 pounds from the Liverpool price as the cost of delivering the goods in Liverpool, and taking the prices to domestic consumers on these same goods at the same date, we have the following prices on plain galvanized wire:

Gauge.	Export.	Domestic.	Difference.	Per cent.
4 to 9	$1.54	$2.70	$1.16	75
10 to 11	1.62	2.97	1.35	83

17	2.46	4.05	1.59	65
18	2.65	4.32	1.69	64

Thus the domestic prices exceed the export price by from 64 to 86 per cent. This is the handicap placed upon the American manufac- It is also the handicap placed by our tariff-protected trusts upon our consumers of wire and wire rope as against foreign consumers of these same goods.

THE WINDOW GLASS TRUST.

ONLY BAD RESULTS FROM THE TAX ON SUNLIGHT.

The history of our glass industries for the last twenty years has been a succession of combinations, pools, lockouts, price-list committees, and agreements fixing prices and wages and limiting production. Wages and prices change often and radically, and nearly all of these tariff-nursed industries are always in an unsettled, unstable, and unhealthy condition.

The result is that we usually pay double price for our glass; and the industry is in a backward state of development.

Instead of making the best and cheapest glass and of dominating the world's markets, as our unrivaled opportunities for production would warrant—cheapest and best silica, coal, gas, and lumber—we are, thanks to our tariff system, only partially supplying our own market, and even that with inferior goods which sell at double the price of better goods in Europe.

The glass trusts, with their tariff clubs, hold up the American consumer, and make him pay $2 for one dollar's worth of glass.

The evils of such methods are not only apparent throughout the glass industry and in the glass-consuming industries, but they extend into State and national politics, and form a part of the "boss" system of government.

Under such conditions and circumstances it is a national sin to continue this tax on sunlight. Some of the leading manufacturers do not hesitate to say that if there had never been any tariff on glass, our glass industry would now be twice as large as it is, and would be employing twice as many men and using twice as much coal, gas, lumber, etc.

EARLY TRUSTS.

As in most other branches of the glass industry, trusts in some form have existed in window glass for twenty years.

The American Window Glass Manufacturers' Association, with its "price-list committee," its "board of control," its "district" and "national wage" committees, and its "tariff committee," was running full blast from about 1880 to 1888, and was deciding how many and what works should be closed and what wages should be paid and prices charged. It worked hard to prevent the passage of the Mills bill in 1888. In 1884, when there was a shortage of glass caused by a lockout and a long fight over wage scales, the manufacturers themselves became importers to supply the trade.

There have been since 1880 periods of comparative competition and low prices, but during such periods the "trust" people have been playing for a new deal and a new grip on the industry. Since 1890 the United Glass Company, a corporation owning 17 of the 108 plants then in existence, has formed the backbone of the window glass trust. From 1893 to 1895 the trust was not in good working order, and prices were comparatively low.

THE PRESENT TRUST.

In 1895 the American Glass Company, selling pool for 85 per cent of the factories, was formed. This pool soon had prices up to the importing point, where it held them firmly until succeeded by the American Window Glass Company, a corporation with $17,000,000 capital, formed in October, 1899. This owns factories with a capacity of about 1,900 pots out of a total capacity of about 2,600 pots. It has not lowered prices, which are about double what they were four years ago.

The estimated value of the 48 or 50 plants absorbed is said to have been put at $6,190,000 by one of the organizers.

VERY HIGH PRICES AND GREAT PROFITS.

There are so many sizes and grades of window glass, the schedules of prices and discounts are so complex, and the prices change so often and differ so much in different districts that it is difficult to compare prices. In general, prices for the last three years have been nearly double what they were for the previous three years; and, the duty averaging nearly 100 per cent, prices are about double what they are in Belgium or England. The following summary of prices is from the Commoner and Glassworker of October 21, 1899:

"From an average price of about $1.50 per box for single and $2 per box for double strength in 1893, the value of glass has quite, if not more than, doubled. * * * The low price of glass was due to a low tariff, combined with the low cost of unwrought material, and reduction in cost of labor, with a poor consumptive demand. * * *

"Since the existence of the American Glass Company, the greatest advance in price has taken place. This company has managed its affairs without change practically since its formation, and has done it so well as to not only control the product, but to fix the price at the highest possible notch.

"The profits during the last three years have been enormous. The pool is said to have made $700,000 in 1896, $1,750,000 in 1897, $2,100,000 in 1898, and still larger profits are anticipated for 1900."

PRICES CAREFULLY ADJUSTED TO TARIFF.

In no other industry, perhaps, are prices adjusted to the cost of imported goods with such precision. The cost of laying down imported glass at interior points being greater than at seaboard, on account of freight, the prices at interior points are held enough higher to cover this difference. Thus customers at Pittsburg, in the shadow of the factories, must pay 14 cents per box more for ordinary window glass than the customer at Boston and 20 cents more than the Pacific coast consumer. The country is divided into six districts and the prices for each are determined by the cost of imported glass in each district after the duty is paid. Prices for the Pacific coast are lowest of all, because the cost of transportation from Belgium is the lowest in comparison with the cost of transportation on domestic plates.

Since 1861 the duty on window glass has changed but slightly, except that it was reduced about 30 per cent under the Wilson bill. The duty now, as under the McKinley and previous bills, varies from about 1⅜ to 3 cents per pound, and averages about 2 cents. This is generally equivalent to between 80 and 100 per cent, and often exceeds 100 per cent. From 1860 to 1890 prices in this country declined an average of 8 per cent, although foreign prices declined 54 per cent from 1867 to 1890. Our prices are now higher than in 1890 or in 1860 for ordinary sizes. This one fact, taken in connection with free natural gas and unrivaled opportunities for production and in view of the great progress made in most other industries, ought to be sufficient to condemn the whole protection theory. No other industry has enjoyed so much protection for so long a period, and no other important manufacturing industry has made so much progress backward. From 1880 to 1890 we imported each year about 30 per cent of our total consumption of window glass. Since 1890 the percentage of imported glass has been somewhat less. It is now about 12 per cent, our consumption amounting to about 5,000,000 boxes.

This trust, like many others, does not possess a complete monopoly. It is said to "hold the umbrella" under which new factories outside the trust have been built and made great profits. It is really the tariff which holds the umbrella. The trust and the outsiders are both secure in their excessive profits under it for a considerable time, until the number of outsiders gets too large. All that time the consumer will be forced to pay high prices, and competition will not lower them because the trust is able to restrict production to only part of the year. Up to a certain point it is profitable for the trust to pursue this policy, and even when that point is reached the margin of profit afforded by the tariff is so great that the trust can make new terms with the outsiders, many of whom, according to the Commoner and Glassworker, have been attracted to the business by the prospect of such a sale of their plants to the trust.

The bulletin of the Department of Labor for March, 1902, published the wholesale prices of American window glass in New York on the first of each month per 50 square feet of single, firsts, 6 by 8 to 10 by 15 inches. Here are some of these prices:

Window glass prices.

	1890.	1891.	1892.	1893.	1894.	1895.
January	$1.99	$2.25	$2.14	$2.14	$2.14	$1.85
April	2.25	2.14	2.14	2.14	2.14	1.59
July	2.25	2.25	1.51	2.14	2.00	1.40
October	2.25	2.25	2.14	2.14	1.85	1.62

	1896.	1897.	1898.	1899.	1900.	1901.
January	$1.62	$2.66	$2.89	$2.89	$2.10	$3.06
April	1.62	1.75	2.36	2.23	2.36	4.80
July	1.67	1.99	2.62	2.89	2.99	4.56
October	1.89	2.39	2.80	2.80	3.27	4.56

Thus, glass that sold for $1.40 per box in July, 1895, sold for $4.80 in April, 1901—the latter price being nearly 3½ times the former, or a raise of 243 per cent. The "economies of production" in trust management are certainly not conspicuous in the prices of window glass.

COMPETITION OF INDEPENDENT COMPANIES.

Of course, such extremely high prices, yielding profits of about 200 per cent on every dollar's worth of glass sold, has tempted independent manufacturers into the field. The independents now have a capacity of about 400 pots out of a total of 3,800. But as there are window glass blowers for only about 2,200 pots, and the labor union makes it next to impossible to obtain more blowers, it is certain that about 1,600 pots must remain idle. As the labor union controls the situation from its standpoint, the so-called "independents" and federation concerns are mostly owned and operated by the skilled glass workers themselves. They usually have agreements with the trust on prices and output, but there is nearly always friction because the "independents" want to work more months than the trust, and to gobble more than their share of the great profits. The trust plants usually operate but six or eight months a year, and in this way limit production and maintain prices. The following from the National Glass Budget of August 9, 1902, discusses the combinations between the trust, the independents, and the jobbers, and sheds light on the internal troubles:

THE WINDOW GLASS SITUATION—IMPORTANT MEETING OF JOBBERS AT ATLANTIC CITY ON FRIDAY OF NEXT WEEK.

"Present indications are that the strained relations which have existed between manufacturers of window glass since the beginning of 1902 will be patched up and that the trade will be controlled during the fire of 1902–3 by three combinations—the American Window Glass Company, the Independent Glass Company, and the Federation Window Glass Company—all working in harmony. In the light of information now in our hands, we feel safe in predicting that not enough new glass will be made before October 15 to disturb market conditions, and at the present rate of consumption stocks now in manufacturers' hands will be pretty well cleaned up by that time. During July the demand for window glass exceeded that of July, 1901, fully 35 per cent, and prices were well maintained. Stocks in jobbers' hands have been reduced to the lowest point ever known at this season of the year, and as soon as jobbers are convinced that the bottom will not be knocked out of prices by a September start, they will be in the market for a large quantity of glass to replenish their empty stock rooms.

"The jobbers are taking an active interest in the movement to prevent the starting of factories before October 15, and if the Independent Glass Company persists in continuing the policy which it has pursued during the past seven months, it will lose the trade of those who last year purchased most of the glass made by this company. In fact, the attitude of those in charge of the sales department of the Independent Company in trying to inflict loss on jobbers who bought their glass, has caused many of the leading distributors of window glass to state that in order for the Independent Glass Company to put itself in line for further business a reorganization of the sales department and the adoption of a new policy will be necessary. It is hoped that a change in this department will be made at the annual meeting to be held in Atlantic City on Tuesday of next week, August 12. * * *

"A meeting of the executive committee of the National Window Glass Jobbers' Association was held in this city on Tuesday last. The meeting was also attended by officers of the American Window Glass Company and the Federation Window Glass Company. Trade conditions generally were discussed, and at the close of the meeting President Gray issued a call for a general meeting of the Jobbers' Association, to be held at the Marlboro Hotel, Atlantic City, on Friday, August 15.

"The jobbers are certain that there is too much glass on hand to make a start in the factories September 1 advisable. Certain cooperative firms, whose bonus benefactors stipulated that they must operate ten months in the year for a given term, and the officers of the Independent Glass Company wish to start up because they have no glass, having sold more than they could make last fire. The American Window Glass Company, backed up by the jobbers, do not wish to start before October 15, because they realize that there is enough glass on hand to fully satisfy all demands till that time, and they know that any start before that time will have a tendency to create an overproduction and tell disastrously on prices. * * *

"The interests of manufactures and jobbers are identical. There is just so much window glass to manufacture and distribute, and the money accuring therefrom belongs, in equity to all the workmen, manufacturers, and jobbers legitimately engaged in its manufacture and distribution. * * *

HORRIBLE TO CONTEMPLATE.

"If the Independent Glass Company has a right to start September 1, all others have the same right. What would happen if all manufacturers were to start their factories on that date will be seen by the following statement:

"There will not be more than 2,200 pots put into actual operation next fire, though there are now about 3,800 pots in existence. There will not be enough skilled workmen to operate more. The product of 2,200 pots during a run of ten months will be 7,920,000 boxes, to which must be added the imports of at least 700,000 boxes, or, in other words, an available supply of 8,620,000 boxes, against which enormous supply there can be placed only a consumptive demand of 5,400,000 boxes, leaving stocks in manufacturers' and jobbers' hands, September 1, 1903, of 3,220,000 boxes, or enough glass to supply this country, exclusive of imports, until March 1, 1904.

"The question is, Is it good sense; is it either fair or honorable in any combination or organization to persist in a policy which will bring about such deplorable conditions as are indicated above?"

PRICES FURTHER ADVANCED IN 1902.

As indicating the great rise in prices which must have occurred this year (1902), the National Glass Budget mentions a suit brought by the Muscatine Sash and Door Company against the Independent Glass Company for $9,542.99. The Independent Company had agreed on March 15, 1902, to deliver 10,000 boxes of assorted glass in May and June, 1902, for $28,898.71. It failed to keep its contract, and the cost of duplicating the order on June 30, 1902, was $39,441. The Muscatine Company sued to recover the difference.

These exorbitant prices could not be charged in this country where the import duty is only 100 per cent were it not that Belgium, the window glass country of Europe, has recently experienced one of the longest strikes on record, and her production of glass is only just catching up with the foreign demand. When European prices fall, ours must also fall, unless the foreigners agree for certain considerations to stay out of our markets. Such a contract is said to have been made recently, and, in fact, is necessary, to account for our present extreme prices.

Possibly the introduction of glass-blowing machines by the trust will, in a few years, bring about sufficient competition to lower prices somewhat. The removal of the duty which fosters and protects this cormorant would give the consumers relief at once, and make it possible for common people again to buy new glass and putty up their stuffed-up windows.

SOME ELOQUENT FLASHES OF REPUBLICAN SILENCE.

[The New York American and Journal, August 5, 1902.]

The Republican campaign text-book designed to supply orators and editors with argument has just been issued. It has nothing to say on the subject of Cuban reciprocity.

Naturally. The Republican record on reciprocity with Cuba is the record of a crime. The denial by Congress of justice to the people of the island we freed from Spain can not be defended or excused. That sacrifice of the national honor was made at the behest of the beet-sugar lobby and the sugar trust. Every American who cares more for the good name of the Republic than he does for the trust-breeding and trust-shielding protective tariff feels his cheeks grow red with shame whenever he thinks of the treatment the new-born Republic of Cuba has received at the hands of the Republican party. No wonder the campaign text-book prefers to discourse of other things.

Another subject on which the Republican official guide to orators and editors is silent is tariff revision. That is not to be discussed if the managers can help it. The "protected interests" want the tariff let alone. Therefore any editor or orator who imitates the action of the Iowa Republicans and calls for such changes in the tariff as would deprive monopoly of its shelter will be guilty of party treason.

But the campaign text-book has much to say about the trusts. In effect its deliverances are these:

First, there is no danger in the trusts.

Second, the Republican party points with pride to its "efforts to execute the antitrust law."

"On June 27 last the Democratic members of the House of Representatives met and adopted a set of resolutions, among them this one:

"The Republican majority in Congress is dominated and controlled by the trusts and monopolies which have the great industries of our country in their grasp. * * * They refuse and fail to bring in any measure to suppress the trusts or to favorably report any of the numerous antitrust bills introduced by Democratic members during this session.

"We favor the immediate passage of a measure to amend the present antitrust law, so as more fully to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and also a measure to reduce the duties on all articles and commodities manufactured and controlled or produced in the United States by a trust or trusts, so as to destroy such illegal combinations, and to reduce the rate of duty on any article or commodity manufactured in the United States and sold in a foreign country more cheaply than in the United States.

"We oppose the adjournment of Congress until the measures mentioned above have been enacted into law."

What was the response of the Republican majority, in possession of the lawmaking power of Congress, to that challenge?

Did the Republicans amend the present tariff antitrust law?

No.

Did the Republicans pass a bill reducing the duties on foreign goods coming into competition with monopolizing trusts?

No.

Did the Republicans pass a bill to discourage high prices at home and low prices abroad for trust-made articles?

No.

The Republican Congress ignored the Democratic challenge to legislate against the trusts as completely as the Republican campaign text-book ignores the dishonoring of the nation in the case of Cuba out of deference to the wishes of the beet-sugar lobby and the sugar trust.

Republican orators may rise to the most impassioned rhetoric, and editors of Republican organs may write with dutiful industry ten hours a day from now until the Congressional elections, but no platform eloquence, no industry with the pen, can alter the record of what has been done and what has not been done.

The record shows that the Republican party sets the greed of monopoly above the nation's honor, and dares not pass laws to curb the trusts in the interest of the American people.

The trusts own the Republican party.

THE BORAX TRUST.

A WORLD TRUST, BUT STILL A TARIFF TRUST—IT SELLS BORAX AT 8 CENTS IN NEW YORK AND 2½ IN LONDON—A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE BORAX INDUSTRY—ALWAYS CONTROLLED BY COMBINATIONS—SECURED INCREASED DUTIES BY MISREPRESENTING FACTS.

The borax trust is one of the best examples of the evils of tariff "protection." Unearned and undeserved profits, enhanced prices, restricted production, limited consumption, employment of foreign labor at low wages, lower prices to foreigners than to Americans, false and hypocritical plea that free borax would destroy the borax industry—these are some of the results of the unnecessary and unjust duties on borax and boracic acid.

AN ARTICLE OF GENERAL USE.

While the borax industry is not one of our great industries—the total product selling for only about $1,500,000 or $2,000,000—it is yet of considerable importance, because borax is an almost essential article in every household and is a most useful article in many industries. It is used largely in the packing of pork and other meats, butter, etc., and is most useful in the arts, manufactures, and mines. It is a flux for all metals, enabling them to melt at a lower temperature. It is used largely in the manufacture of soap and leather. It is a bleach, an emollient, an antiseptic, a cleanser and purifier, and a medicine. The extent of its use in many industries depends largely upon its price.

The principal borax mines or deposits of the world are in California and Nevada, in Asia Minor, Peru, and Chile. Mines or deposits exist in Italy, Turkey, and other countries; but the cost of producing in them is too great to make them of commercial importance.

The largest, most easily worked, and most productive mines of the world are those in California. These were discovered in 1856, but were not much worked until about 1873.

TARIFF DUTIES.

Previous to 1883 there was no duty on borate of lime and crude borate. The tariff of 1883 made the duty on refined borax and on pure boracic acid 5 cents per pound, on commercial boracic acid 4 cents, and on borate of lime and crude borax 3 cents. The tariff of 1890 made the duty on all boracic acid 5 cents. The tariff of 1894 reduced the duty on all borax to 2 cents per pound, on boracic acid to 3 cents and on borate of lime to 1½ cents. The tariff of 1897 made the duty on borax and boracic acid 5 cents, and the duty on borates containing more than 36 per cent of anhydrous boracic acid 4 cents, and less than 36 per cent of acid 3 cents. The object lesson resulting from these changes of duties is most interesting, not only to our own citizens, but to the people of the entire world.

CONTROLLED BY TRUSTS.

Because of the limited area in which the mines are found and the difficulty of reaching and of operating them, it seems but natural that these mines or deposits should fall into few hands and that the few owners should combine to prevent competition and to bring about high prices. As early as 1878 an agreement was entered into between the California producers by which production was to be curtailed. A more formal combination was formed in 1879.

In 1885 the "borax board" was organized. It included about all of the producers upon the Pacific slope. A more perfect combination was formed in 1888, and in November, 1890, the Pacific Coast Borax Company absorbed nearly all of the producers. It has always been the policy of Mr. M. F. Smith, the head of this company, to gobble up all of the new deposits which might prove of commercial value. He has usually worked but one or two of the ten or twelve mines which his company owns, and to-day is working only the Colemanite mine, at Daggett, Cal., and is holding idle such important deposits as those in Death Valley and San Bernardino, Cal., and those in Nevada. One or two small deposits, such as those in Columbus, Nev., may be worked on shares, but the product of these small properties all passes through the hands of the Pacific Coast Borax Company, and no crude borax is obtainable except through this company.

A WORLD TRUST.

Prior to the latter part of 1894 the foreign market was in the hands of a European syndicate, which had a virtual monopoly. This foreign syndicate had an understanding with the Pacific Coast company through which the latter was left to the enjoyment of the American market. Soon after the reduction of duties in 1894 and the low price at which our trust was compelled to sell, our producers began an aggressive warfare on the foreign monopoly. In June, 1896, the Pacific Borax and Redwood's Chemical Works (Limited) was incorporated in England with a capital of $2,550,000 and $500,000 of bonds. It took over the business and properties of the Pacific Coast Borax Company and of Redwood & Sons, chemical manufacturers in England. Mr. M. F. Smith became the managing director in the United States. This new English-American combination carried on such an aggressive and expensive warfare in Europe that in January, 1899, the foreign manufacturers capitulated, and sold their interests to a new combination, dictated by the California producers. This new combination is the Borax Consolidated Works (Limited) with a capital of $7,000,000. It is an amalgamation of the twelve principal borax producers and refiners of the world, namely:

The Pacific Borax and Redwood's Chemical Works (Limited); Mear & Green (Limited), Kidsgrove, Staffordshire, England; Borax Company (Limited), London; Societe Lyonnaise des Mines et Usines de Borax, of Lyon, France; Empresa de Ascotan Company, Chile; Sociedad Boratera de Carcote, near Asoctan, Chile; Boratera de Cosapilla, near Tacua, Chile; Boratera de Chilicolpa, near Tacua, Chile; Compania Boratera de Arequipa, Peru, including the deposits formerly owned by Señors Pena and Caballero; Compania Boratera de Ubinas, Arequipa, Peru; that part of the Pintados deposit formerly the property of the Products Distribution Company (Limited), Iquique, Chile, and 7,142 out of the 110,000 shares of the San Bernardino Borax Mining Company of California.

These are not all the mines and sources of production in the world; but, according to the Oil, Paint and Drug Reporter of January 13, 1899, nearly the whole supply of the world has been obtained from them.

TARIFF PRICES AND PROFITS.

Four days after the McKinley bill became effective, in October, 1890, the California trust raised the price of borax (which had been 8½ to 8¾ cents in August and September of 1890) to 9¼ to 9¾ cents per pound. The following table gives the date of some of the more important changes in prices:

The Wilson bill took effect on August 28, 1894. The following comment is from the Oil, Paint and Drug Reporter of December 31, 1894:

"The sweeping cut in the price of borax, which we announce in another column, to take effect January 1, 1895, will be a great surprise to the trade, as the impression has become current that no further reduction would be necessary to enable the Americans to keep out the foreign and retain complete control of the home markets. * * * The net decline in the price since the new tariff came into operation is 2¾ cents per pound on crystals and powdered, and 2½ cents per pound on refined in bags."

It closed with the following suggestive statement:

"It has been generally understood that an agreement exists between the American producers and the European syndicate, under which the former were to be left in possession of the home market, provided they agreed to keep out of the foreign markets. Outside competition abroad, however, made it possible for goods to be imported. Under the circumstances, what is to prevent the American producers exporting goods, and thus enlarging their markets and general sphere of usefulness, from a material standpoint?"

On February 4, 1895, the same journal said:

"The Pacific Coast Borax Company, finding the results of its efforts to place borax within the reach of all at reduced figures to have been so satisfactory, has issued another circular, announcing still lower prices for the current month, and which are lower than borax can be imported for or produced here, except under the most favorable conditions."

On October 1, 1895, the same authority said:

"In the years that have passed large profits were made; and it may be necessary to cut into them, if the competition now in progress is of long duration. At the same time there is reason for believing that the California producers are making money under existing conditions." * * * "There is no danger of any further competition with the foreign article. * * * The manufacturers in England have not renewed the syndicate agreement, and there does not appear to be any likelihood of their doing so."

DINGLEY BILL PRICES.

The articles on borax in the Oil, Paint and Drug Reporter tell a different story under the Dingley law, which took effect July 24, 1897.

On August 30, 1897, the Reporter said:

"The new tariff has materially altered the situation in borax in this country. * * * There is now no possibility of any competition being feared from Europe, with the duty on refined 5 cents per pound as against 2 cents under the act of 1894, and the domestic market is left entirely to the home refiners. * * *

"Under the low prices which were made necessary by the 2-cent duty in the act of 1894, the demand has been largely increased; and it is possible that any material advance would check the consumption. * * * Refiners may be trusted not to make a move that will restrict their production."

On June 17, 1898, this journal said:

"The advance in the rate of duty on borax in the act of 1897, from 2 cents per pound to 5 cents, has caused a rise in the price here from 5¼ cents in carloads, which was the market quotation when the tariff became operative, to 6¾ cents. * * *

"It is evidently the determination of refiners to raise the price by slow and easy stages until they shall reap the full increase of benefit which the new act gives them. It would not have been good policy to advance the price 3 cents per pound as soon as the tariff bill became a law, as it might have aroused the ire of consumers of borax."

BORAX EXPORTED TO EUROPE.

That no duty is necessary to preserve our borax industry is evident from the fact that our output increased greatly during the Wilson bill period, and that we have always exported borax and sold it in England, except when an agreement, offensive and defensive, between our own and foreign producers kept our product at home. A few more quotations will throw light on this subject. On November 25, 1895, after discussing the heavy imports of borate of lime (4,165,765 pounds) in 1894–95, at an import price of 2½ cents per pound, the Oil, Paint, and Drug Reporter said:

"Another feature of the situation is the exports of American borate of lime to England lately. Since October 14, 11,558 bags have been shipped, at a valuation of $22,939. The average price per pound was 2 cents."

July 13, 1896, the Reporter said:

"A foreign outlet for California crude was sought, and large quantities were exported to Liverpool last autumn. They were sold at a profit of about 2 cents per pound. The sales of the American company for the seven months ending March 21 last were at the rate of 11,000,000 pounds per annum, over 1,000,000 pounds having been exported to England. The actual exports to July 1, 1896, from last autumn amounts to 20,420 bags, valued at $40,018. Notwithstanding the fact that California borate of lime was sold in England at 2 cents per pound, there were imported into New York for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, 4,227,947 pounds of foreign borate, valued at $102,732, as against 4,165,765 pounds the previous year, valued at $95,734. * * *

"From a glance at the condition of affairs in the borax industry, it appears that the California producers hold the key to the situation. They have succeeded in underselling the South American and Asiatic borate of lime in the English market and have thus affected the profits of the Borax Company (Limited), the concern which owns the Asiatic deposits. The annual report of this company stated that, had it not been for the French works (protected) of the company, no profit would have been made, owing to the competition with the California borate."

On August 30, 1897, the Oil, Paint, and Drug Reporter unintentionally illustrated the difference between trusts in protected and unprotected countries:

"The Borax Union of Great Britain collapsed some two months ago, due, possibly, to competition with borax from American borate. The price is now £14 per ton, or about 3 cents per pound, the lowest price on record. * * *

"The Societe Lyonnaise, which controls its own deposits of crude in Asia Minor and is protected on its refined in France, is also doing well; but a careful analysis of the situation can not but reveal the commanding position occupied by the California producers in the markets of the world under the new conditions, which have been partially created by the new tariff and in great measure by the development of the Pacific slope."

In September, 1897, the British and Colonial Druggist of England explained the ability of the American producers to compete in the markets of the world by saying that the "natural advantages in the matter of deposits of pure borax" was added an extremely heavy duty on borax, which "practically bars foreign product from an entry into the States." It said:

"We can put this advantage in a startling way by saying that, if American manufacturers obtained for their borax sold at home the present price of the article in this country plus the duty in America, they would be in a position to give away one and one-half times as much borax as they sold at home, and yet receive a return per pound on the whole higher than the present English price per pound."

This condition should prove more "startling" to Americans than to foreigners, however. In 1898, 46,118 bags (about 2,000 tons) of borax was exported to England out of a total production in America of about 12,000 tons.

If this was exported to England at a profit, then our protective tariff simply helped the trust to outrageous profits on the borax sold here. If it was not sold at a profit, then the tariff made Americans pay the trust two profits on the borax they consumed, while Englishmen paid no profit.

American warfare from behind protective tariff walls made the borax industry unprofitable in unprotected countries, depreciated the value of foreign plants and mines, and made it easy for our Government-supported trust to buy up its foreign competitors and to form a world trust. This it has done. Our borax tariff is, therefore, the real mother of this great world trust.

TRUST PRICES HERE AND IN ENGLAND.

But observe now the difference between trust prices in protected America and in unprotected England. On October 28, 1899, the Chemist and Druggist of England quoted refined borax at 16 shillings per hundredweight. This is less than 3½ cents per pound, as against 7¼ cents in New York. And yet the same company supplies borax from the same mines and mills to both markets. Could there be a better illustration than this of the oppressive effects of tariff-protected trusts?

It may be asked, Why, if it owns all of the profitable mines of the world, does not the trust put its prices as high in Europe as in America? It is partly because it has not got, and it is not easy to get, as complete control of the world's borax mines as those in California and Nevada, and partly because the trust has not as yet had full opportunity to test its world monopoly. Some of the companies which it took over were under contract to supply raw material at certain prices for one, two, or three years. Until these contracts expire, refined borax will be likely to remain low in England. (For 1902 export prices and other late information, see under "Export Prices.")

THE LEAD TRUST.

AMERICAN LEAD A CENT A POUND LESS IN ENGLAND THAN HERE—THE GOVERNMENT A PARTNER IN ALL TARIFF TRUSTS—DOES NOT SHARE PROFITS, BUT KEEPS OFF COMPETITORS AND IS A POWERFUL AND VALUABLE PARTNER.

[By George A. Macbeth.]

The most of the combines of to-day, created for the purpose of extortion in price, could not and would not exist if it was not for the part the United States takes in them.

Here is one example, and the same is true of several commodities managed by combines. This quotation is from the New York Commercial, March 6, 1900:

"Lead.—Was steady and unchanged at $4.70 per pound spot to March. In St. Louis the market was firm, with scant offerings at $4.57½@$4.62½, according to brands. Soft Spanish was unchanged at £16 11s. 3d. in London. Arrivals at this port were 1,000 tons bullion from Tampico; exports from this port, 650 tons to Hamburg. Imports of lead during the week ending March 2 were 2,806 tons; exports for the week, 1,794 tons."

Few see these quotations. Very few understand them. The great mass do not know anything about them whatever. Figure out the pounds, shilling, and pence, the London quotation for a long ton of 2,240 pounds, and it makes the price of lead in London $3.60 per 100 pounds, as against $4.70 in New York—$1.10 more in New York than London, or a difference of $22 per ton of 2,000 pounds.

Yet some is exported, and must go at the price in London. Please note, some is imported, also. This is brought here, and reexported without the payment of any duty.

The kernel of it all is that about twenty men are managing the matter of price of all the lead consumed in the United States, and have been doing so for some time—with the aid of the Government.

Not a pound is sold without the concurrence of these men, and it is held as firmly and nicely as could be. It is managed with consummate skill.

Most likely many will say, at first thought, "It is nothing to me if there is a duty on lead." Such people do not know how this material enters into the cost of so many things. Thousands of men are working with this material, which costs 30 per cent more than it should—30 per cent artificial value. We pay this artificial price, but the Government does not get it. (It amounts to about $5,000,000 a year extorted from the American people.) It enters into the cost of every house built, and of a thousand and one things which people do not know that lead has anything to do with.

This lead combine has arisen and is a result of the tariff on lead. It could not exist without this tariff. It is the very perfection of a trust or combine brought into existence by the Government's action.

The same may be said of lumber and of many other articles manufactured by trusts.

Truly it may be said the commercial element is predominating in affairs of Government in an unwonted degree.

Evidently there is some reward for the "fat-frying" process in the past and a keen eye on the future.

If the actual effects of protective tariff legislation were known, it would be swept out of existence quickly, and our Congress would be confined to its true constitutional functions. Its hands would then be kept off from all attempts at fixing values of commodities.

THE PRINTING PAPER TRUST.

BRIEFS OF AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION PRAYING FOR FREE PAPER AND PULP.

The briefs of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association covers the case of the printing paper trust so well that further comment is unnecessary. The following extracts are from the briefs presented to the United States and British Joint High Commission, December, 1898, and January, 1899:

ABSURDITY OF TARIFF ON PAPER AND PULP.

"The directors of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, representing 157 daily newspapers of the United States, and representing the bulk of the total consumption of print paper, respectfully request the American members of the Joint High Commission to advocate the inclusion of free paper and free pulp in the adjustment of our relations with Canada, and in support of this request submit the following reasons therefor:

"The present tariff rates on printing paper, unsized, sized, or glued, suitable for books and newspapers, valued at not above 2 cents per pound, is three-tenths of a cent per pound, or $6 per ton. The tariff rate on mechanically ground wood pulp is one-twelfth of a cent per pound, or $1.67 per ton.

"During the year ending June 30, 1898, the paper manufacturers of the United States exported 53,718 tons of printing paper (news and book), valued at $2,702,351, an average of 1,000 tons per week. No paper for news printing is brought into the United States.

"The total importations of wood pulp in twelve months, ended June 30, 1898 (according to the Paper Mill of August 11, 1898), were 28,846 tons, valued at $601,642, against 41,707 tons in 1897, valued at $800,886.

"The entire revenue received from the importation of mechanically ground wood pulp last year was $41,842, and as no news paper was imported, therefore no serious question of national economy or threatening deficits could be urged in opposition to free pulp and free paper.

"The tariff on paper is prohibitory and the rate for wood pulp is excessive. The American paper manufacturers need no protection, because they can manufacture paper cheaper than is done in any other part of the world. The American manufacturers are protected to the extent of $1.60 per ton by reason of their proximity to their customers. The difference in the cost of transportation to market is their great guaranty of security against Canada or any foreign country. They are also protected by their ability to obtain cheaper and more convenient supplies of coal and chemicals, which as yet are not obtainable in the Canadian forests. American manufacturers are now supplying the Australian and Japanese markets, and are underselling the British, Sweden, and German manufacturers in the British market.

TRUST FORMED IN 1898.

"In January, 1898, all the big and profitable paper mills in the United States, with a few unimportant exceptions, were merged into the International Paper Company, a combination that absorbed twenty-four mills, producing about 80 per cent of the entire American output. This corporation or trust was capitalized upon a basis of $55,000,000, divided as follows:

Bonds	$10,000,000
Preferred stock	25,000,000
Common stock	20,000,000

"The organizers of the trust frankly admitted at the outset that its common stock represented only good will, yet a quarterly dividend of 1 per cent on the common stock was declared in November, payable December 31, 1898. This common stock is now selling on Wall street at 60. A circular issued by Hatch & Foote on July 15, 1898, and based upon information 'furnished by officers' of the International Paper Company, showed that it was making a profit of $10 per ton on its output. The same authority states that the trust handles 143,500 horsepower; that it owns 450,000 acres of spruce lands in New York, New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, and Michigan, and holds Government licenses for 1,132,000 acres in Canada.

"The capital represented by the annual rentals of $196,000 per year for water power and by other fixed charges paid by the trust would increase the total capitalization represented by that combination to $65,000,000. The entire output of this corporation, representing 1,420 tons per day for theoretical capacity, could be reproduced by a present investment of $15,000,000, so that the American consumers of newspapers are forced to pay dividends upon an inflated and wholly fictitious valuation of at least $40,000,000.

MONOPOLY PRICES FOLLOWED.

"This combination of twenty-four mills, while embracing many inferior and worthless mills, also included practically all of the locations in the United States where cheap and ample water power, cheap and good spruce wood, and cheap rates to market can be obtained for a mill of 100 tons daily capacity.

"Immediately after the organization of the trust it raised the price of paper wherever possible. In three cases it raised the price $10 a ton, and has averaged an increase of $5 per ton on its daily output of 1,420 tons, equaling an increased tax of $2,130,000 per annum upon the newspapers of the country, which now pay a total exceeding $20,000,000 per annum for their paper supply.
